UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST

And Chronicle

GEORGE R. GRAHAM & CO. PUBLISHERS.

NUMBER NINETY-EIGHT CHESNUT STREET.

TWO DOLLARS A-YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS · DEVOTED TO GENERAL NEWS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, MORALITY, AGRICULTURE AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXIII. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1843. WHOLE NO. 1127.

Original Poetry.

A SONG.

"OH, THERE IS ONE WHOSE VOICE TO HEAR."

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST, BY SKETCHER.

Oh, there is one whose voice to hear
With rapture thrills my bosom through,
Whose image hov'ring over our,
To life an impulse gives anew.
'Tis her I love,
'Tis her I love,
She who doth fondly love me too.

Around her dazzling brow of white
Cluster the silky curls of jet,
Her form is grace, her step is light;
But she a sweeter charm hath yet.
The maid I love,
The maid I love;
Who can her winning smiles forget?

She hath upon her damask cheek
A tint like morning's rosy bow,
And summer skies look dull and bleak
Compared with the bright eyes so blue
Of her I love,
Of her I love.
Of her to whom I'm ever true.

Oh, she's a creature gay and wild,
Yet back she all a woman's mind,
In home she's like a little child,
Yet in there spirit there confined
She's one to love,
She's one to love,
And cool of love var spirits bind

Original Tales.

THE SULTAN IN SPECTACLES.

A Translation from the French.

BY EDGAR WAYNE.

CHAPTER I.

THE WISH.

The Sultan Achmet had reigned ten years over the vast empire of the Faithful. He had many virtues, was full of courage, of magnanimity and of bounty—men called him the Good Achmet. But the Good Achmet had great faults. Easily prejudiced, he was foolishly fond of those whom he loved, and heartily detested those whom he disliked; though his hate and his friendship were often no more than mere caprices. He was readily accessible to flattery—implicitly received as truth the fulsome eulogies which parasites and flatterers lavished upon him, and weakly confided in the sincerity of the artful caresses of the beautiful slaves of his harem. Inordinate self-love is credulous; it leads a man to distrust himself more than he distrusts others,—to hear with avidity, and readily to believe those who flatter him.

But if Achmet found great pleasure in being flattered, on the other hand contradiction was insupportable to him. Truth when it opposed his whims and desires was extremely offensive to him,—it was incredible, and as falsehood he denounced and repulsed it. In a word, the all things—like all vain men, he was invulnerable—incorrigible. He loved and detested only those counsels which fell in with his own prejudices and weak fancies—and rejected and condemned all others. Man saw that he could be easily deceived by those who would go to work in the right way to undertake it; and in the courts of kings there are always low and cringing minds capable of doing that trouble.

The good Achmet had a Vizier who had served him since his accession to the throne—a tried servant—the sage Rustan. He was in some sort a legacy from the father of Achmet, for the weak Sultan would never have had, of his own election, a vizier whom while he feared, he could not avoid respecting. A tall stately form gave Rustan an imposing presence, and a long beard, which age had silvered, conferred upon his serene and hard features an expression of solemn grave and unyielding. As he had a profound knowledge of state affairs, and the experience of three score years and ten, he naturally assumed the right to speak; and the habit of speaking unreserved, if gave him an aplomb in pronouncing unpleasant truths, the facility of which made the hearer lose sight of its bolldness. When Achmet projected some foolish enterprise, his Vizier, unhesitatingly denounced its extravagance; and when Achmet's profusion had ruined the Exchequer, Rustan did not fail to tell him, without indirection, whose folly it was that had ruined the treasury. In a word the vizier often plainly opposed the Sultan, because the latter was always disposed to make a fool of himself; a disposition not rare, it may be suspected, among the Commanders of the Faithful, or absolute disposers of kingdoms under any other title.

Achmet had a favorite among his courtiers, and a favorite in his harem, whom he loved to idolatry, and who had, in the government more influence than the Vizier. In important affairs Achmet hearkened only to the counsels of his dear Nesmour and his beautiful Fatima—by them decisions only, he guided his government. The favorite, loaded already with benefits, supplicated daily for new gifts, and disposed of all places in the civil list, all charges in the household, all promotions in the army. Achmet knew how to refuse him nothing. "Nesmour is so much my friend," the Sultan said to himself, "I can deny him nothing. He asks not for himself—he desires only my prosperity and happiness!" Confidence in Sultan and in slave, is ever the companion of blind friendship.

He believed every word the beautiful Fatima uttered—anticipated her wildest and most extravagant desires, and would have ruined the best man among his subjects to gratify the ever changing caprices of his favorite Sultana. "Fatima has no life but in mine," he said—"what can I refuse the heart! She Even only for Achmet—she derives only my glory!" Such tone, the other men, feel the zeal of being loved, and are grateful, to idiocy, for the shadow even of affection in a beautiful woman.

It will easily be perceived, that, with such a character Achmet seldom found himself in accord with the grand Vizier. They spoke only to disagree—but while that, violent enough, frequently was exhibited on the part of the Sultan, the sage Rustan never lost his imperturbable coldness—never lost the unalterable calm which he conferred by a consciousness of right and reason. But Achmet, blind in his passionate affection for the Sultana, and infatuated in his attachment to his favorite, saw in Rustan only a man hard, proud, and severe, who made a pleasure for himself in marring his masters dearest pleasures, and in thwarting his most cherished and innocent enjoyments. He had long regarded him with disgust even to abhorrence, and continued to him his title of Vizier only out of respect for his ancient services. He waited only a favorable occasion to deprive the sage of his honors, and confer them upon his dear and more respected spirit—Nesmour, the favorite.

Achmet regarded Fatima as she slept. "How beautiful!" he mentally ejaculated. "The paradise of the Prophet does not contain an Houri so lovely; and yet Rustan would have me deny her wishes! Would that the riches of the universe could be put in a single gem that I might present it to her! While asleep I trace the dreams of one, or awake she thinks only of me—for me she herself has sold. This Rustan pretends to love me, and yet all I love he hates, and all that I detest he worships. It is not so with Fatima! The old hunks! Would that Mahomet would send me the magic glasses of which Roxana spoke the other day. 'Sultan,' the slave said, 'upon me blind. Oh that the Prophet would send you the magic glasses, that you might read man's hearts!' Happy now, I should be doubly happy then, for I would study Fatima's."

The Sultan stole softly away, that he might not disturb the repose of the sleeping girl. Fatima turned upon her couch—the lips on which the Sultan had dwelt entranced, parted with a smile. They murmured one little word—it was not the name of Achmet, Commander of the Faithful.

CHAPTER II.

THE MAGIC GLASSES—TRYING THEM ON.

Sultans seldom wish to no purpose—certainly not the Sultans of story. Achmet had wished for the wonderful glasses, and an opinion was not long wanting to put them to his eyes. There dwelt in Constantinople an Arabian magician and astrologer, who read the future with more precision and certainty than ordinary teachers of the faithful can read the horoscope. Things occult were to him no secrets, and the mysteries of nature were his pastime. At Achmet's summons the astrologer bowed before the Sultan. At Achmet's desire he agreed that the wonderful spectacles should be done to order on the morrow; and he would have as readily promised any other trifle of the same easy description of manufacture. "The preparation of such instruments," said the tradesman in miracles, "is a mere trifle. I had hoped magnificent Sultan, that you were about to command Achmet to her bosom, and smiled through her tears, One little liquid pearl escaped and fell upon his forehead.

The magician's spectacles were conquered. Glass eyes could not weep.

CHAPTER III.

BROKEN GLASSES—BROKEN SPELLS.

"Just Allah!" said Achmet to himself—"If Nesmour tour right—if the magician has deceived me—if the glasses are false"—

"How!" cried Fatima—"What glasses! What magician! What have these vile spectacles to do with our love!"

When the Sultan told her all about the magician, the talisman spectacles and their miraculous properties. And then, of course, Fatima wept again. At length she cried—

"Oh, cruel! now I know the whole extent of my misfortune. I have lost your love forever, because I have lost your confidence. You will nomore trust a vile magician than my caresses and my tears. See, then, the worthy prize of my affection! But why did you spare me in your rage? Why did you not relieve me of an existence, which your odious suspicions have rendered?" And this being the proper place to faint, the beautiful Fatima sank at his feet without sense or motion. The Sultan caught her from the floor, and employed all the means which affection and terror prompted to restore her to consciousness; and as she returned to life he vowed to her by swearing anew, to love her forever.

Fatima saw her advantage, and as a last blow to make certain of the victory, she told him that the magic spectacles were only a stratagem of the Vizier, and proposed to him immediately to procure himself of the proof. "You know," she said, "how that proud and odious Rustan dictate you—how he thwarts and contradicts you in every thing. Put him to the some proof that you have Nesmour, and I am sure that you will read in his soul all that he wishes you to find there, but precisely the reverse of what it contains."

Achmet lost no time in embracing this adroit and perfidious counsel. He carried his griefs and suspicions into the garden where he knew that at that hour Rustan would be walking. He met the Vizier, and that officer approached to give his master one of his usual frank and unavoiry lectures—but Achmet was in no state to listen. With the talismanic glasses he looked to the inmost recesses of his Vizier's heart, and what was his astonishment to read there: cool, attachment, inviolable fidelity.

"Now," cried the Sultan, "I doubt Fatima no longer. She was right—my glasses are false. They have made me read treason in the bosoms of all whom I most dearly love—they show me ardent affection in the heart of he, who, among all my subjects, loves me least! Just Heaven! Where should I have been if Fatima had not unmasked this imposture! Happy discovery! My last repose shall return, and the villain of a magician shall pay dearly for his roguery!" The spectacles he trampled to pieces with his foot.

But the able magician did not read the future in vain, and had already left the city. This news confirmed, in Achmet's mind, his perfidy. Nesmour was recalled, and implored to forget the suspicions which he no longer existed; and the crafty favorite lost no time in persuading Achmet, that the Vizier was the accomplice of the magician. An order was issued for Rustan's arrest, disgrace, imprisonment, and the confiscation of his goods. But when he was sought, it was found that he too was gone, and no doubt was left of his participation in the plot.

But while these events took place in the Seraglio, strange rumors began to prevail in the city. It was said everywhere that the Sultan had become insane, and it was boldly prophesied that he would soon be dethroned. The Sultan was pronounced unworthy to reign—and it was whispered from mouth to mouth that he had no son to succeed him. The emeute increased, the tumult grew fast, and filled the capital. A portion of the Janissaries took up arms and besieged the Seraglio—Down with Achmet! was the cry—Live Nesmour! And Nesmour himself headed the revolt, of which, indeed, he was the chief origin, and ascended the besiegers with promises most brilliant.

Achmet wished to arm the Seraglio, but the male inmates refused to take arms against Nesmour, the lover of Fatima; and the beautiful Sultana herself offered her gorgeous for the Sultan's head! Achmet, with the per dependants who remained faithful, defended himself like a hero. Yet he is about to succumb to numbers. There is revolt without and within—the Seraglio is on the point of being forced by the rebel Janissaries, who they are attacked by a troop which still remain faithful to their master. The combat becomes terrible—the walls are bathed in blood, and the two parties dispute the entrance with equal ferocity.

The right triumphs! The perfidious Nesmour is killed—the rebels are put to flight—and Rustan, the generous and brave Rustan, who had foreseen and provided against the revolt, enters the Seraglio at the head of his faithful and victorious soldiers. The combat within ceases—the Sultan is delivered from his enemies—and the perfidious but beautiful Fatima pays with her head, the forfeit of her treachery.

What shall paint the astonishment and gratitude of Achmet! To the Vizier whom he had condemned, he owed his safety—his throne—his life. "Sage Rustan," he cried, "how shall I testify my gratitude? I repelled thy counsels—I delivered myself up to enemies, while I detested from the bottom of my heart, the only man who was sincerely attached to me! Hereafter, oh! Rustan! tell me always the truth in counsel, as heretofore! But where is the magician?"

"Dead," replied the Vizier.

"Dead!" repeated Achmet. "Fool that I was; I destroyed in my madness, a treasure which I did not appreciate—and now that I have learned its value, how shall I replace it?"

"Oh, sublime Sultan," said the Vizier, "why give yourself up to useless regrets! Experience will teach you, that you have but broken a useless talisman. The best glasses are useless to those who will see only through their passions, and those who see only with the eyes of reason, need no MAGIC SPECTACLES."

TO OBTAIN BEER FROM CHALK.—In London, according to Punch, a great deal of beer is obtained from chalk. The system is to establish a good credit at a public house, and when this is once obtained a few pounds ready indeed the proprietor to "chalk you down" for almost any amount. This recipe for obtaining beer has been used to some little extent in this country for several years.

From the Magazines

FROM THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

THE FAIR MAID OF FLANDERS.

BY ROBERT L. WADE.

"Oh who can measure woman's love,
Or probe its depth and length!
With all the weakness of a dove,
It hath a lion's strength."

'Twas a night of festivity in Flanders. The ancestral old country seat of the gallant and famed Count Baldwin, ruler of the province, was illumed with thousands of brilliant lights and tapers, displayed at every loop, and window, and outlet of the time-worn pile. The strains of rich, joyous music, that filled the air with melody most sweet, told in language too impressive to be mistaken, that naught but gayety for the moment reigned within. Over turret, battlement and tower, bright banners, and gay festoons, waved their silken folds to the light evening breeze; within the spacious halls, resounded the rapturous strains of soul-inspiring music—the light, gay laughter of merry-hearted damsels, the measured tread of of the dancer's steps, the lay of the welcomed troubadour blending the sweet inflections of his voice with the harmony of his instrument, the shouts of health and wassail, the carousal of the boisterous, and the busy hum of human voices, mingling their many tones, and sending heavenward, a strange and confusing, yet far from unpleasing, medly sound and noise, din and riot.

Without, 'twas a scene of splendor and serenity. Down upon one of the richest garden spots of nature that earth can boast of, poured the soft light of the bright moon in the full flood of glory and magnificence; and as the trees and shrubbery waved their young limbs and branches with the influence of the breeze, the luxuriant glades and spreading lawns, were chequered with changing spots of light and shade, most beautiful to look upon. And there were those there, who deemed that nature was gifted with attractions quite equal to those displayed within; for the lady-loves, young and higher, yet higher, rode the sovereign of the night, one by one, and in couples, aye, and even in parties of three and four, had members of that vast company there assembled, taken from the dazzling and heated excitement of the ball-room, to the battlements and tower-walls; until there had now collected upon the outworks and platforms of the castle, at least a third of those who had been for the last hour, the gay participators in the magnificent and splendid festivity of the mighty Lord of Flanders.

But there was one couple upon the platform leading to the tower gate, that kept aloof, and seemed to shun the observation of the rest. When the chivalric and courteous Count Baldwin had been informed that a portion of his company had left the dance, to enjoy the coolness of the night in the open, unpolluted air, with that kindness and urbanity which he ever evinced for the comfort and gratification of his guests, he had ordered a display of fireballoons, and the attendance of a band of music upon the lawn, to the light of the moon, and the gay throng had now, when those for whose pleasure these matters had been arranged, had flocked toward that side from whence they could most readily witness the performance, and listen to the music, that military musical band from the spot which they had, from the first, occupied, but remained gazing in silence over the massy parapet, toward the far-off precipitous heights of the rocky Jura, which were visible from where they stood, marking the boundary of fair France.

The elder of the two, was a young man, in the prime and flower of youth, a graceful, and apparently gentle cavalier, of stately mien, and pleasant countenance, and arrayed in rich robes of fur and cloth, adorned with jewels. He wore a small velvet cap, from which rose a single long heron's feather; a baldrick of satin, worked with golden flowers and his sword hung from his shoulder to his side, where hung a long, narrow, Italian blade, in a golden scabbard, with its hilt of mother-of-pearl, garnished with many costly jewels, and in the girdle that confined his vest, was fastened a dagger, more for ornament, than any fears of the necessity of its being required for use, a small dirk in a curiously carved and ornamented sheath. Close unto his companion, a damsel—aye, and a lovely one, too, he stood. He had stationed himself, with one hand closely clasping hers, and pouring into her ear, if impassioned gestures, and an earnest eloquent expression of his countenance, any he construed into such a meaning, a tale of unconstrained, and enthusiastical love, of deep and pure devotion, unswerving and sincere. And, well, indeed, might he find room in his warm and youthful heart, to endorse the image of that sweet being, for never, since the day, when Eve was created, and called it by no harsher name—mother Eve was expelled from celestial Eden, had there dawned upon the earth a brighter creature, or one better modelled by nature to attach it to herself, during the hours that he could spare from the business of his mission, and draw him into an acknowledgment that the passion which she had too long kindly felt within her own bosom, was reciprocated by him. But without wait! Most true, he seemed to linger around her as much as possible, to anticipate all her wishes, serve her with the most devoted fidelity, and because, in fact, her only companion. But no fire of love kindled in his breast, or shot its flickering flame through his sparkling eyes; no lisp of fond or tender affection, had he suffered to escape his lips, and neither word nor action evinced that he regarded her any more than as a lovely and fascinating woman, and an agreeable companion with whom to while away the passing hours.

Time did mature progress with the two—she lowing with all the concentrated fondness and emotion of ardent love; he, unconscious that he had excited any feelings but those which absence, now speedily approaching, could easily efface. Thus, as I have said, did matters progress, until the day before the ceremonial for his departure, when Brihtric Stane received a message that the Princess would be pleased to see him. The summons was immediately obeyed, and following the page, he was soon in the presence of the Lady Matilda. She was alone in her apartment, and as the page retired, after having ushered in the envoy, she rose from her couch, upon which she had been reclining, and offered her hand to him. Raising it to his lips with accustomed gallantry, he pressed thereon a tender kiss, when he was startled by a warm tear-drop that fell upon his uncovered neck. Looking up, he found with much surprise, that the pearly liquid was welling up to the eyes of the lovely maiden, and that her cheeks were wet with its overflow.

"In the name of the holy Virgin, I ashort thee, lady, to tell me what secret grief has moved you thus!"

For an instant, she gazed into his eyes, as if she would have read, with the aid of only her own passion, the thoughts that were flitting through his mind, and then, as her entire frame was agitated with some inward convulsive effort, she threw herself upon his bosom, encircled his neck with her soft arms, and in a low voice, broken with sobs and sighs, exclaimed—

"Cast me not off, I beseech you. I am mad—my brain is turned, and I care not what I do. Leave me to—leave me, and despair has driven me to this. Hear me—Oh! hear me—cast me not off. Let me lay my aching head upon this place—keep me to your bosom—Oh! would that you might forever—for I love you, dearly, madly, madly, body and soul forever!"

Astonishment—utter, petrifying astonishment, for a time, held the young man dumb at these words. He knew not what to say—how to answer this sudden and unexpected declaration.

"Consider, dear lady,"—he at length found tongue to say—but ere he could get any further, she interrupted him with—

"Not a word—urge no obstacles. I will not, cannot listen to them. I have not come to this rashly, nor without consideration. I have thought, meditated, pondered and dreamed upon it for weeks, and now, that you know all, my heart is relieved, and nothing will swerve me from my fixed, unalterable determination. Years I am, and yours only; and with you will I go. I am prepared for sudden marriage, and will be instantaneous flight. With you, I am happy—mistress or wife, I care not, so that I feel power your love, and gladly will I follow you to the ends of the earth, happy to be the object of your affections, and wishing for naught else."

"It may not—cannot be, lady," answered Brihtric Stane, in an anxious tone. "Reflect awhile, and this folly—"

"No! folly, said you!" and the maiden, tossing her arms from the light hold which they had maintained around his neck, and drawing back a few feet, "folly, is it?"

"Even so," answered Brihtric Stane, perceiving that the circumstance required firmness and decision. "But a few weeks from now, when I shall be in mine own country, you will rail against this weak outburst of yours, and find another, whom you will love better."

"Never!" she answered.

"Then, but one thing more remains for me to say," continued he, slowly, and perhaps coldly, "lady, my affections I can never give to you, for they are pledged to another."

"Another!" she interrupted with startling emphasis.

"Another's. In mine own land there dwells a maiden, unto whom my heart is plighted, and not crowns and kingdoms will tempt me to break that pledge."

"Then, may God curse you both. You shall one day find cause to think of this moment," said she with impressing look and gesture, sweeping from the room, leaving him to meditate and sorrow over the occurrence of the hour.

* * * *

Years, long years passed away. The young and beautiful Matilda had become the bride of the ruler whom she had scorned on the evening of her first meeting with Brihtric Stane, and that saline had swelled the roar of arms around the land of Britain, and near were the Saxon crowns, under the name and title of William the Conqueror. Yet, the hopes of time had not cooled in the least, the resentment that rankled in the heart of the lovely Queen against the object of her first affections. Long did she meditate upon certain and sweet revenge, and when her lord and husband had brought his countrymen to the yoke of bondage, and the opportunity presented itself, even before she had set her foot upon the green sward of her newly conquered kingdom, by her orders, her emissaries had seized upon the person of her formerly beloved Saxon, and having stripped him of everything that he possessed, wife, children, friends, property and all, threw him into a deep dungeon of a subterranean prison, there to linger out the remainder of his days in misery and torment."

---

* By consulting "Thierry's Norman Conquest," and that deeply interesting and well written work of Agnes Strickland, the "Queens of England," the reader will find that the imperfect and hasty sketch possesses the merit of truth.

FROM THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER, FOR FEB.

THE MORNING LIGHT.

BY MRS. A. M. F. ANNAN.

Gladdening gift to all fresh, pure things,
Children and flowers and birds and springs!
Chasing the night, when I feel thee come,
With her step so stealy, and her lip so dumb;
I joy, thou though wearied and worn it be,
My soul hath a welcome still for thee!

Sleepless and lone since set of sun,
I have wished that the long, dark hours were done;
Watching the shadows upon the wall,
And the lamps their flame in its rise and fall,
And praying for rest from the pillows pain
That sickness and sorrow have rendered my brain.
Fretted with thoughts of thee, I lay,
And of voices of children set at play,
And of merry laughs in the new in wood,
With birds to sing for their solitude,—
The birds whose blest, sweet notes I hear,
'Mid the unbreaking dawn of a cloudless clear.
Though I did not hope with the day to see,
The flowers beneath, nor upon the tree,
Nor the spring bell up through the glittering sands,
Yet I knew that with thee, my little heads
Would come, with the water to cool my brow,
With which it is bathed so kindly now.
Soothing it as, in a clear sick room,
To have a wild-flower's soft perfume.
That was gathered from where we have loved to go,
The tribute of innocent hearts, to show
That e'en in their merriest hour, are not
We and our helplessness, forgot!
Sweet, sweet, thou art welcome, my lovely hers,
Straight just drawn from its forest-are,
Telling of home that has round it swept,—
Of lights and shades that here o'er it creep,
Of the pictures of leaves that have on it lain.
And of grass it has caught from the summer rain!
Glorious Gem! O, how my soul
Is at dawn away from thy morning light.
With shame for wishes or thoughts of sin.
Nestled and fed in my heart within;
Ever with fear for doubt that would stain my way,
Of the watchful eyes that awake with day!

FROM SARGENT'S MAGAZINE, FOR MARCH.

A FRAGMENT.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

As some vast lake, when thousand currents wind
And chafe and glitter as their waters blend,
Now fresh and stainless from their mountain home,
Now by rough channels occupied to addying foam,
Or darkly turbid, as with sullen toil
They sweep in shadow through the loosening soil,
Long, then, shall retain, as it slows into a placid concrete,
Or creeping voiceless through the leafy shade,—
So, in the season of man's tumultuous strife,
Mingles and moulds the nourishing waves of life.

There be that basks in fortune's acoustic blaze
Spreads his gay banners to the vulgar gaze;
There also rude, rude arrest across his lowly name,
And finite for breed to feed the vulture fame;
There begged vice scatters his last resources,
And stamps the stamp of the ruin which hand hurried
There the last exile, friendless and alone,
Broods o'er his griefs, unknowing and unknown;
There passion's victim, in the careless throng,
In despairing guilt, forgets her girlhood's wrong;
And pallid shapes, unnoticed as they pass,
With trembling lips and hopeless eyes,
And wearied age, unconscious of repose,
And sickly childhood, born to want and woes,
Joined by years in the one tumultuous sphere,
In one dark vortex roll and disappear!

FROM THE LADY'S WORLD.

LUCY WYNNE;

OR, RUSTIC

Felicity and Fashionable Misery.

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

CHAPTER I.

The term fashion is merely the elliptic synonyme of display, and now a city every object is indelibly and universally stamped with it. What in its original beauty the Great Author sealed Nature, the art of man contorts into a second edition marked Fashion. Modesty is not the germ of a court, and if by accident it blooms among the weeds of fashion, it becomes by the contrast as conspicuous—it is turned officinal by the exaggeration of arrogance around it, in which vanity struggles to out-brazen vanity. Devoid of modesty, the fashionable man of the city is only happy when prominent; and like the moth he works. If you would seek his mansion, you must raise your eyes to where it towers upon the hill-top, or trawse up from the lowland to a height where it immediately disappointed to be less, as if its imposing chimneys were endeavoring to overtrack the more elevated situation of its neighbors. And strange, that the monuments of his pride should so reflect upon his silly vanity, that where by his works he has most desired to show his superiority his insignificance should become most apparent. For amidst all his gaudy grandeur, is not the plotting declaiser of the city less noble than the rustic who dwells and cultivates humanity with nature in his fertile path; or was the one, who revels in the artificial haunts of luxury and vice, enjoy a tithe of the happiness of the other, who sits at feasts of the Omnipotent's preparation, and pledges Heaven in the pure nectar of the fresh fountain? Ere the interrogation is answered, permit us to make a narration.

It was near the midnight hour of a cold November night, that a light still glimmered from the windows of a cottage, in a small village, within modestly half concealed in a humble grove, at the extremity of a romantic vale in Western Virginia. A lone female, and handsome, though rather beyond the meridian of her beauty, sat with her little family within a small and tidy, but comfortably furnished room. The Holy Book was open upon her knee, and she was poring over the sacred pages like one engaged in nothing provident for her spiritual necessities; but as at intervals a sighing of the air without would awake the midnight stillness to a whisper, she would start—assert her bowed form and lean her head in a listening attitude, which betrayed there was something of earth not wholly banished from her heart.

She was a mother; and closely embroided in a bed that graced the room, slumbered her charge, a light-haired boy. The child stirred, half as if the day's sport lingered in his dreams, dashed the bedclothes from his slender form, and laughed aloud. The mother approached the bed, re-composed the disturbed covering about the boy's frame, kissed his unconscious cheek, and then, startled by the sound of footsteps without, turned, with an eager smile, to the door. In another moment she was clasped in a husband's arms. After the mutual congratulations and embracements of the meeting were over, the wife inquired of the cause of his unexpected return, and while the travel-wearied man refreshed himself he rehearsed what he had seen in his absence.

He had been in New York some weeks endeavoring to secure a small claim of which some heartless wrecking had attempt to defraud him. Tardy justice had awarded him his due, and that was a source of gratification to both—and that they should enjoy the "horse," for their little farm afforded them no easy living, and they were not a thousand dollars depositors; but they possessed no little variety of possessions of their kind, and some pleasure in the pride of their hearts. And so the father spoke of his success, he planned toward the lad as if he would fain have endowed the child.

"He sleeps," said the mother in a suppressed tone, as if she feared to disturb the little slumberer; and the father resumed his narration. The few weeks he had spent in the North had been peculiarly marked by the boisterous spirit of political excitement. He described the nocturnal meetings and the torch light processions; the endless arrays of motlered temperance, and thousands of voices that shouted responses to the words of impassioned orators.

The child roused by the familiar voice, slipped from the bed and crouched his light form, silently and unobserved, by the father's side. With an eager ear did he drink in the glowing descriptions, which, although he scarcely comprehended them, conveyed to his delighted imagination an idea of something greatly wonderful—something that made his little heart leap wild, with an indistinct anticipation of sometime mingling in these glorious scenes himself—glorious, because novelty and pageantry constitute the Eden of a childish fancy. At length as he became more excited by the picture, he laid his hand upon his fathers arm, who, for the first time conscious of his presence, was asked a moment in acute surprise the tiny wonder-wrapped features that were upturned to his, and then clasped the little one fondly to his heart in an embrace of paternal love. His little imagined, however, that his words had made an impression upon that young mind which would only be fructuated by the sad reality of future experience. But it was so! The slightest circumstances in childhood has often fixed the colors of an after life, and from that moment, a dream of ambition filled the boy's breast—at first only manifested in a longing for the empty preferments of the, to him unknown, world; but in time assuming the deeper shade of ambitious aspiration.

CHAPTER II.

As we have but brief space to chronicle the events of nearly a life-time, we must start an avalanche of ten years from the hill-side of futurity into the valley of the past. Three hopes and three years buried in the avalanche that we can tell of. Among the rest, the father and mother, whom we introduced in the foregoing chapter, slept beneath the sod; the cottage and farm were tenanted, though not owned, by strangers, and the child was sprung into the proud youth. He had become the ward of a wealthy farmer, whose domains were adjacent to his father's, and who, during the latter's life had been his most valued friend. And well did farmer Wynne acquit himself of the duties of guardian. He reared his ward as one of his own children, and improved and watched over his little estate, with as much care as if it had belonged to his own issue. All the accomplishments and knowledge that could add to his enjoyment, and make him, in returning country town, he was made master of, and at the age of eighteen Rufus Barton began to think of choosing an occupation for life. Wynne, and those of the neighbors who knew his heart and his prudence, strongly daughter, the lovely Lucy Wynne, had done some execution on his heart—and they thought right, for he did love the girl, and not vainly: they were long ago betrothed. There were those who thought, too, that with a gentle wife and a competence, that no noble an heritage as the Wynne estate superadded to his own, he would be contented to settle himself quietly for life in his native country. But in this they underrated the youth's ambition, and underrating for his strange yearning to mingle in the mad struggles of an ambitious world. Ever since his childish eye had been delighted with the scenes described by his father upon the night of his return from New York, his spirit had been filled with a desire to behold the fabulous of his dreams of pageantry; and now that the time had arrived for him to select a profession, he determined to seek one somewhere in the turmoil and excitement of a great city.

His guardian opposed the determination. He had himself known something of the vices and disappointions of the city, and he felt that to throw the boy amidst temptations, was to jeopardize his virtue. He therefore reasoned, commanded, and entreated, but all to no effect. Rufus persisted, and as he could not obtain his guardian's consent, prepared to go without it.

The hour he fixed for his departure arrived. It was a sultry morning in August—scarce nine o'clock, and yet the sun's intense beam had already drank every particle of dew from the blades of grass and counts. Leaf and shrub were drooping lazily, or seemed to shrink from its ardent ray; the flocks had crowed to graze in the fields, and sought shelter in the woodland shades, and nature's planted noble children, as had forfeited his wings close in some leafy nook. Rufus, after a final interview with his guardian, left the mansion-house, and, with feelings too ardent to be affected, even by the fervor summer's sun, pursued his course toward a little village that lay nestled in a broad tract of meadow-land. That grove was the appointed spot for his farewell interview with the little mistress of his heart. He entered it.

With her small form half concealed by one of those porticoes a Chinese princess might have carved—posing a nose-fringed rock, her fair form bent slightly forward, with one round arm resting upon the bare limb of a shrub-oak, and the other, which had hitherto idly shown the noisy break that dashed by its roots, and with her blue eye fixed thoughtfully on the whirling eddies of the stream, stood Lucy Wynne. She was clad in a simple white dress of lawn, "Mr. Rufus," which tucked that had shaded her brow was laid aside, and the dark ringlets danced unconfined about her graceful neck, while the blue scarf, thrown carelessly back, fell mingling with the folds of her dress, leaving her fair shoulders, and the outline of her lily bust, exposed to the soft breeze that stole through the sylvan spot. She seemed tracing a dream in the silver spray, that leaped, as if in vain endeavor to reach the ruby lips that smiled upon him. But without wait!

Rufus Barton almost feared to disturb the picture, and hesitated—but too late, for her quick ear had caught his step. She dropped her carelessness attitude, and modestly retreated a few paces from the bank, as the youthful half smiled as she extended him her hand, and vainly struggled to be playful, or to seem indifferent, as she said:—"Rufus, you only just—you are not going to leave us!"

"Yes, I am earnest, Lucy; I have come to bid you a short adieu. In three years I shall be what the world calls a man—"

"Of the world!" added Lucy, half reproachfully.

"In the world, I hope," continued the youth. "I hope I shall have found a home, and a reputation in it. Then I shall return, and lead you to share them."

"Men hoop no promises!" sighed the girl, with an air of unaffected melancholy.

"Then call me not a man," said the youth with warmth; "and remove your gloomy prophecies until there is need for them—which trust me shall be never! But come, now, let us think lightly of it. The separation will be short—only three years."

"Three! And you call it short!"

"Surely! Lucy. Look back. Three years ago we had just learned to love, and it seems but yesterday."

"Ah! but that time has been like a pleasant dream," replied Lucy. "No parting—no absence—no fears. Besides, how do I know but that you may make love to a dozen others in your absence?"

"Well, dearest," pursued the youth eagerly, "so I may—but at last, it will be more delightful, by being on much the more romantic."

"But in that case," sighed the girl, "you would be enjoying all the romance at my expense."

"Are you selfish?" enquired the youth, in the same sobbing strain.

"In nothing but your affections," she replied, and a tear that trembled in her eye betrayed how little she relished such pettings.

"Nay, then, if you take light words so unkindly," returned Rufus. "I must needs be serious, and swear constancy if you like. But come, a parting kiss, and then adieu, for I have tarried too long."

"Nay! I would ill accord with the mockery you so much desire."

"Modesty! To love as we have—and even a single pressure of the lips on such a separation?"

"You called it short but now."

"And yet long enough to atone for the sin of a parting."

Lucy laid her finger on his lips to prevent the words, then yielding an reluctantly, and so timidly as if she feared the very trees would prate of the guilty license. A pressure of the hand—a tear brushed from either's eye, and they parted.

"Tis well," mentally ejaculated the girl, indulging in those feelings of melancholy presentiment, which, no matter how much confidence may be placed in the possessor of the heart, will present themselves on such occasions: "'tis well, I gave no more hopes to him to be laughed at and mocked when tears are broken."

"Many a true word spoken in jest," whispered a voice. Lucy trembled, and glanced searchingly around her. Could there been a silent witness of the scene? No! 'twas only imagination. And yet she doubted. The next moment her doubts was confirmed. The figure of a small woman, with brown hair and jolly eye-brows, opening silently from behind a tree, and raising a tambourine with her slender fingers, laughed in the astonished girl's face. Lucy shrank from her gaze with an exclamation of terror, but soon recovering, in some measure, her self-possession, she asked, in a faltering tone, "what creature are you?"

"Not a fairy," replied the woman, while a smile lighted the brown features that once, certainly, had been pleasing. "But you are a fairy," she continued; "your's is a sweet face, and I marred much if the youth can ever forget it. No!—what!—have I lived and hitched so many fair brows, to mischief, not one? No! no! But may he be will be true—he looked as if he meant to be."

"Who and what are you?" interrupted Lucy, her curiosity and interest awakened by the manner of the strange woman, and her stronger praise.

"Who, and what?" repeated the woman. "Does not this speak me a wanderer?"—and she threw her tambourine into the air, dexterously catching it as it descended, and poising it on her finger, then passing her fingers lightly over its breathing surface, she sang—

"Oh, I have roved in many lands,
And many friends I've met"—

"No! not many—not many friends, but many mortals. I've been in England—I've been in France—I've been in Italy, and I shall die in America."

She paused, and Lucy, emboldened by her singular familiarity, as well as pleased with her voice, which was sweetly rich, asked her to sing again.

"Lady!" said the minstrel woman, "I often think of England, the dear land of my birth, and remember how my young days were passed in roving its bright hills, and then I can only sing—

"In the days when we went gipsying,
A long time ago,
The hills and lanes in their best
Were dressed from top to toe
We danced, and sang the jocund strain
Upon the forest green;
And sought her mirth and jollity
Around as could be seen.
And then we passed the pleasant time,
Nor thought of care nor woe,
In the days when we went gipsying
A long time ago.

Ah those happy, happy days—they are gone! Like you, I had a lover then—he's gone, too! Pretty lady! did you never hear of a—gipsey?"

At the effect which the last sentence produced upon Lucy, the woman burst into a wild, loud laugh, which she suddenly checked, laid her hole convulsively upon her heart, and bounding with a fearful shriek, fell into the arms of the bewildered girl. A serpent which had sprung into the grass, was uncoiling with its slimy folds in a clump of tall weeds that grew by the margin of the stream.

CHAPTER III.

Three years passed, and Rufus Barton kept not his promise with Lucy Wynne. He had reached the city of Baltimore, and applied his mind to the study of law. By the aid of a tolerable figure, and a tolerable address he had been enabled to move in the first of the fashionable circles, and had become initiated into all the tolerable vices, and intolerable extravagancies of the ton. In short, he had spent three years in a manner, and for enjoyment, not as he might be expected, had ceased to think of Lucy, except, as a guardian erotic flame—a simple blossom of the country garden, not to be compared with the gaudy flowers of the city hot-house. Meanwhile he had run this very fashionable career, without—by no means rare example—ever pausing to count the cost. It may for a while be avoided, but the day of reckoning eventually must come. It did come to our hero.

He was sitting in his room on the evening of his twenty-first birth day, for the first time engaged in serious reflection upon the course of his past life, and for the first time he began to entertain a doubt of the efficacy of his guardian's plan. A letter had arrived from his guardian, which closed thus:—"The sum contained includes the last cent of principal and interest of the four thousand dollars which your departed father left for your use. Your wants have, I fear, have managed to squander that amount in three years in best known to yourself. With economy and prudence, you might have been enabled to live upon little more than the interest, and at the end of the term of minority, which will be in a few days, might have had at your command a reasonable capital to invest in some profitable business. All that now remains in my hands is the little farm, with the buildings upon it, which may be worth perhaps a thousand. What your prospects are you have never given me to understand, but I hope the best of my fears may never be realized."

This was rather a gloomy source of contemplation, and for the moment he deeply felt the merited rebuke. After the first harrowing feelings subsided, he began making himself promises of amendment found him on my conquest. He soon made all warmth, which she encouraged with such emotions of reciprocal attachment that he was convinced he had only to demand the hand of the "most amiable creature in the world" to obtain it; and he only waited an opportunity.

One delightful evening, early in September, the amiant was sent down to Annapolis, with a select party upon a pleasant excursion. Half minks, and the moment of leaving to let the gay beauty, who thought the delicate and romantic Rufus, as the best chat the sparkling spirit, Rutabaga that ever was not a match for him. Conversation warming the dancers, with a fair prospect of a match, moved the grounds of Spring of Then Mahlon, with Rufus Rutan for his partner in the quadrille. It was only twilight when they reached the limits of Annapolis but the young revellers were hurt upon a street through the streets of the ancient city, even if it were to be ended by moonlight. Consequently the party proceeded, with the exception of a few, whose inclinations led them to pass the hotel on the broad decks of the ——. Among these was Clara, who felt or feigned a slight indisposition, and of course Rufus was but too happy to linger in attendance. For a while they strolled the deserted upper deck, and then passed to watch the moon as she rose from the Eastern shore. The beauty of the scene, the balmy breath of evening, twilight melting into moonlight—all disposed to the creation of sympathizing hearts. And especially did the indulgence of the hour steal over the heart of the young lover. His feelings struggled into words, and his passion was soon declared. He dwelt the hand which she yielded passively to his pressure, and raising his eyes, he knew that a tear trembled there. This were achievement enough, was enough. He expressed his gratitude for the token, and was indulging her sore and his own heart with the eloquence of a rhapsody, when he was interrupted by a voice at him which sighed, "Oh! poor Lucy Wynne!" He looked around. There were several persons, male and female, upon the other part of the deck, but none of them so near in the voice had seemed, nor even to most their words spoken in a common tone of voice could be distinguished.

"There must be spirits in the air," laughed Clara; "for surely that voice seemed just at your elbow."

"I could have sworn it," replied Rufus, "yet it must have been an illusion." That he did not really think it an illusion was plain from his agitation, which happily his fair inamorata attributed to a different and more self-gratifying cause. The incident, however, sealed our hero's rhapsodies for the evening.

Soon after, the rest of the party returned aboard, and the boat was again put under way, homeward bound. The trip proved an unfortunate one for Rufus. It was one o'clock in the morning before the boat reached Baltimore, and exposure to the night air, and the damp dew that was falling heavily, gave him a violent cold, which, with the extreme excitement of mind that prior had occasioned, brought on a fever that prostrated him for several weeks.

He had recovered so far as to be able to leave his room, and was standing in the door of his boarding-house, conversing with several of his fellow boarders, when a sensation was excited by a party of tumbling acrobats, who, with a crowd at their heels, had halted upon the opposite side of the street, and with a hand organ and several other instruments, were galloping through a variety of tunes to the infinite amusement of some half dozen little urchins, who were giggling at them, and dropping them their pennies from the windows above. Presently one of the musicians, a little woman with a tambourine, left the crowd and crossed to the door of the boarding-house. Here she performed several pieces, at the same time tossing the instrument through so many evolutions that it seemed to be endowed with volition, and dancing a tune in the air of its own accord.

"Do you sing, good woman?" asked Rufus.

"A song?" exclaimed several of the others at the same moment.

Fixing her black eyes steadfastly upon Rufus, who wrapped in his cloak to guard against the dampness of the atmosphere, was leaning against the door frame, the woman struck her tambourine and sang:

"Let him who loves a maid,
Never, never leave her:
When absent she's afraid
He may oft decayes her."

She paused a moment, as if to see the effect of her song. Rufus averted his face from her gaze, with a feeling of uneasiness he could not himself account for. The woman proceeded, finished her song, and received from each of her auditors a small coin by way of discount, for a crowd was gathering around the door, and they found it would become inconvenient. As she left, she turned to Rufus, who was the last to throw in his donation, and whispered aside: "Meet me in Hopsack's Park at six o'clock, and you shall learn a secret."

He started. It was the mysterious voice. He would have detained her, but without pausing for a reply she hopped nimbly from the steps, and rejoining the crowd, disappeared.

CHAPTER V.

It was about noonday that the incident last related occurred. Rufus spent the evening in a state of excitement not to be described. The revelation of one mystery had started another. What could that woman know of his early love, and what could be the nature of her secret? It was surely connected with Lucy Wynne, and in the relation which he now stood with another, what could be more important? Several times he determined not to go; but the pitch to which his curiosity had been aroused, together with certain undefined feelings that involuntarily had intruded with the thoughts of Lucy, led him on, and at six o'clock he repaired to the appointed place. The Park was deserted, and were an air of boldness unusual for so fashionable a resort, and the strange woman was not there. Muffling himself closer in his cloak, and leaning against a tree, he waited minute after minute, in impatient expectation. Few long his thoughts were thrown into a new channel by the sight of a couple of figures who entered the Park. One was a tall, graceful female;—he could not be mistaken, it was Clara McAlvin. She was hanging rather more fondly than he thought became his accepted, upon the arm of one of his most detested rivals. They made a circuit through the Park, and then proceeded around the Washington Monument, which they entered. Jealousy was a disease that Rufus had never suffered with, but it must be confessed that this sight roused uneasiness within him of a somewhat dubious character. He felt an irresistible desire to see further. A misgiving had entered his mind, and he knew he could not feel easy until it was reduced to certainty. He determined to ascend the Monument and meet them. Of course they could not suspect but that his appearance there was accidental, while he could easily discover, from Clara's reception of him, whether he stood as far as he had imagined, or was supplanted. Actuated thus he entered the Monument, and receiving from the courteous janitor a lighted lamp, commenced winding his course up the dark, damp, and narrow stairway. He had gotten about half way up when the light he carried went out, and he soon became aware of his imprudence in venturing to ascend in the feeble state of health under which he was laboring. Disease and mental excitement had made him extremely nervous and in that condition his rotary progression up the narrow flight, in darkness more gloomy than midnight, soon produced such a giddiness of the brain that he was unable to proceed. He seated himself upon the cold steps, and, for a moment, the Monument seemed spinning around with fearful rapidity, while a faintness of the most sickening nature crept through every limb. To those who have never experienced it, an adequate conception of the misery of the sensation cannot be conveyed. Fearing lest he should lose his consciousness, he roused himself, and with a desperate effort succeeded in reaching the top. Here he sank exhausted; but the pure air quickly restored him, and rising he stepped out into the lodge. The first object which met his view could scarcely be said to repay him for his painful exertion. Clara stood with her hand reclined affectionately upon her companion's shoulder, while one of his arms encircled her lovely waist. She and her attendant were talking low and earnestly. Rufus thought, too, that just then the youth received the tribute of a kiss; but the dazzling effects of the light, upon emerging from the dark stairway, had partially blinded him, and he might have been mistaken. He saw enough, however, to break the spell which had bound him, and whatever of real passion he might have entertained toward the fair coquette, was, in that instant, changed by pride to hearty contempt. By a step forward he made them aware of his presence, and startled them from their loving position—the lady with a blush of confusion, and her companion with a smile of triumph. With an air of indifference, scarcely affected, Rufus apologized for the interruption. Clara soon regained her composure, and a short reserved conversation ensued between the trio, in the course of which our hero made several remarks of cool sarcasm, which, although not comprehended by his rival, had their intended effect upon the false lady, and he could easily perceive that she writhed under them. Soon after they left him alone upon the lodge, thanking her lucky stars that he had been delivered from the deceitful accomplishments of Miss Clara McAlvin. Though not entirely freed from regret of the defeat, he was, at least, cured of the folly of loving a coquette.

It was almost twilight ere he descended from the Monument, and when he did he found the admiring woman waiting in the Park.

"If I had not a woman's curiosity," said he, as he approached her, "you would scarcely see me here; and now that I am here, I pray you, good woman, withhold not your secret."

"I suppose you have anticipated it," replied the woman. "I merely intended to show you that Clara McAlvin was false."

"I have seen it," said Rufus; "and truly I should thank you as a deliverer. But what of Lucy Wynne?"

"I said nothing of her."

"But you seem to know something of her—where is she?"

"A deserted flower beneath her father's roof," sighed the woman.

"And you—what know you of her early love? You have been her confidant."

"I know of your declaration to Clara McAlvin. Remember that excursion to Annapolis. And yet, you will hardly assume me of being her confidant."

"Then for good or for evil, why do you haunt me? You are really a riddle."

"A riddle you will not be able to read, until your feelings were more strongly affected," replied the woman.

"You seem strangely to have become possessed of truths. Perhaps you are a sybil," he continued with a smile, "and can tell of the future. What if I should return to Lucy Wynne?"

"Do you return, you at last, it will be the more delightful, by being so much the more romantic," returned the woman with an arch smile, repeating the words he had made use of at parting with Lucy six years before.

"Then you have overheard more of my declarations than one!" before he could finish the sentence the strange companion turned upon her heel and left him alone.

He reached his boarding house that evening an altered man, in more feelings than one, and began seriously to meditate a return to the house of his parents. He had gained mystery of the woman and accomplished a lady acquainted in the life he followed. The wealth he was acquiring was really a consideration for the time it expended, and that day after day only served to strengthen his resolution. The mind was impressed with a determinated idea, day after day only served to strengthen his resolution of the impossibility of his ever following in seclusion his happiness; and in proportion as these convictions pressed, a misery of his early days came back, until his heart turned again to Lucy Wynne, with as much fondness as in days of old. A few months only elapsed, ere expectancy of health and strength, and tolerable fortune, he bade adieu to the city.

"And what can you tell of the strange maid of the woodpile?" asked his happy Rufus, as one week after his return and reconciliation, he seated himself by the side of the mistress of his young affections in her own pretty bower.

"A wandering fancy overheard our parting words in the grove," replied Lucy Wynne, in a voice which a few years had only rendered more melodiously sweet and rich. "In return for her curiosity she was taken by a magnet, and during the illness which followed I had her constant attendant. When she recovered she expressed the deepest gratitude for my little kindness. She was a creature full of more singularities than I can recount, and when she left she said, I thought in jest, that she would go back my love and send him back true. She has kept her word."

"And deep is the debt of gratitude I owe her for returning you to my treasure—to you, dear Lucy!"

"But how long is the restoration to last?" she asked, smiling—"you will room again."

"Never!" he exclaimed. "Next week (you have promised) you shall be married, and then where I room you will. But banish your fears; for I have had too bitter experience ever again to forsake RUSTIC FELICITY FOR FASHIONABLE MISERY."

United States SATURDAY POST.

EDITED AND PUBLISHED BY
GEORGE R. GRAHAM & CO.

Philadelphia:
Saturday Morning, March 4, 1843.

NEW ARRANGEMENT.

Samuel D. Patterson, Esq., a gentleman well known as an able writer and practical editor, has become by purchase one of the proprietors of the United States Saturday Post. Mr. G. J. Peterson retires from the concern, and will hereafter devote his entire attention to his flourishing periodical, "The Lady's World."

The firm will be changed to Samuel D. Patterson & Co., to whom all letters relative to the business of the establishment will hereafter be addressed.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

The new arrangement renders it necessary that all outstanding accounts should be settled up as fast as possible. Will our friends who are in arrears, remit their accounts at once. They cannot complain that we have been in the habit of dunning, but now we urge payment promptly.

OUR WEEKLY GOSSIP.

Our attentive readers (and it were profanation to suppose that the Post has any others) have not, of course, forgotten Sir Robert Peel's speech as published in last Saturday's paper. Reference to the Congressional Report, will show that the subject has caught the attention of both Houses of Congress; and quite an interesting sketch of a debate in the Senate will be found under its proper head. Moderate men of all parties will incline to Mr. Archer's definition of the position of affairs in relation to the Search Question, viz: That prior to the treaty, Great Britain claimed both the Right of Search and that of Visitation—that by the treaty, she has relinquished the first, and that she will not exercise the latter. On the other hand, some of the ultra English politicians insist that Great Britain never should have relinquished the Right of Search, and some go even so far as to say that she has not. Others say that it is purely a belligerent right, for which, in time of peace there is no call, and that in time of war Great Britain will not hesitate to search vessels under neutral flags, whether the bunting they wear be American or not.

The Right of Search need not be discussed now, for strictly considered, it certainly is abandoned by the Treaty. Instructions have been issued to English Naval Commanders, in which they are told that if satisfied that a vessel is American, they are to let her go without even demanding a sight of the cargo of slaves on board. The subject of Visitation meets the inquiry at the threshhold with the question what is it? What is visitation merely, and where is the dividing line between Visitation and Search? The British Authorities, it is said, claim the right only to ascertain whether the flag a vessel wears is, bonafide, hers or not—and if we can understand the speeches of some of our Senators, they claim, on the other hand, that the flag of itself, is protection enough against the visit of a British cruiser. The truth is, that this is a delicate question, which can never be settled while the parties are cautious about it; and on the other hand it is one in which too open a feeling of concession might lead to the establishment of very troublesome precedents—and dangerous as troublesome. On the one hand, the natural and, to a great degree, national enough prejudice against the interference of Mr. John Bull, forbids his making too free with the American vessels, under any pretext. On the other side, if a more particular piece of bunting is to prevent a British cruiser from boarding a vessel, the United States will have the whole charge of the suppression of all slavers, of all nations, for no other colors will be worn than American.

Let us see if we cannot find some parallel by which to try this matter. Any citizen of Philadelphia may be accused of theft. On the oath of the complainant, a search warrant is issued, and the premises of the accused are ransacked from garret to cellar. If proof of the crime is found, it is all very well for the searchers. If on the other hand, no such proof is discovered, the party injured and mortified by the proceeding has a remedy at law.

But to come nearer the point in discussion. If a vessel is suspected on a pirate, any cruiser, of any nation, does not accept to order her to heave to, to be searched. If she does not comply with the signal, a shot from the cruiser goes dancing along in the wake, under her mess. If that does not answer, a shot is sent among the rigging, as a reminder that she had better comply; and if all this does not serve, the man of war proceeds to cripple the runaway in such a manner that she cannot run any longer. And, though innocent, the fugitive who subjected himself by contumacy to all this, has no redress by the law of nations and of naval etiquette. It is considered the duty of a merchantman—or rather a sort of deference to superior force, to accept a visit, if the other desires it; and we have heard of few instances in which such attentions from a man-of-war were resented. Should any unreasonable delay, or any serious injury or insult be inflicted by the cruiser, there is a remedy in reparation by the government of the aggrieving party, on the remonstrance of the government of the party aggrieved. Such proceedings are allowed where piracy, (outlawed by all nations,) is suspected, and the man-of-war proceeds, ostensibly with the pirate, whatever other she may meet. In this case the claim set up, is the right to visit and determine, not whether a vessel is a slover, but whether she is an American—whether her flag is honestly worn, and her papers are genuine. It strikes us, that a new treaty, or a new codicil, may be necessary, to escape the difficulties which must both class rational interpretations of the treaty, as it regards the right of Visitation on the Coast of Africa. We "ask nothing that is not clearly right—we submit to nothing wrong." A Message from the President will also be found in this day's paper touching the same important matter. We need not commend it to the attention of the reader, nor can we bestow praise of its manly tone. We are disposed to think with Mr. Tyler, that "the apparent difference between the two governments is rather one of definition than of principle."

There is still another topic of concern upon the occasion growing out of the late Treaty. The English papers have discovered something in relation to the Boundary, about which they are exceedingly indignant—principally prompted thereto by that Capt. Dugald Dalgetty in carrying, Mr. Fonthanelough, welcome "United States Geologist," Gulliver is said of this, however, in another place.

By an announcement in this day's paper, it will be perceived that a change has taken place in the proprietorship. The character of the paper will, however, undergo no change from the circumstance, except such improvements as may be suggested by experience from time to time.

We call the attention of the reader to Mr. Wayne's translation of a French story, with an Eastern plot. It is worth reading, for the moral it conveys. Our original department next week will contain a story by a lady, which all gentlemen will be bound to like, and which the ladies must approve, as a matter of course.

THE BOUNDARY.

Just as the last steamship was leaving Great Britain the English newspapers had got up a tolerable exhibition of wrath against this country, of which we give the following, from the Times as a specimen:

"It is a disgraceful piece of trickery that we did not receive news from an American. We know them to be dishonest, and unfaithful in their money transactions, but did not expect to deal with thinable cheating among their statesmen. We trust that this lesson will not be thrown away upon our country, let us henceforth put no confidence in American promises, or in Webster vows; let us not negotiate with a people devoid of the commonest principles of honor; let insist not; and before we have any tricks played us in the Oregon, let us send a fleet of heavy armed and well manned steamboats to pass out our rights in the fertile and valuable valley of the Columbia river."

And the London Sun, Third Edition, which issued Thursday No. 2, of the day on which the steamer sailed, says, that, in a certain event, "Mr. Webster will find, that, far from preserving peace, he has taken the most effectual means ever devised by a Minister, for plunging two countries in a deadly war." Probably, by this time, the reader begins to desire to know, what all this is about. We shall endeavor to satisfy him in as clear and concise a manner as possible.

It appears then, that at the request of a French Noblesman, Dr. Franklin, while in France, marked his idea of the Maine Boundary with a strong red line in a map—that Mr. Sparks, the historian found and procured this map, and sent it home to Washington—that there is no doubt whatever of its authenticity as the map which Dr. Franklin marked—and that there is as little doubt that Mr. Webster has seen it, and that it was the preferred in the Senate while the subject of certifying the treaty was under consideration. Dr. Franklin's line, moreover, gives the British more of the disputed territory than they ever claimed; and the charge of trickery, perversion, and thimble-rigging against the American is made because Mr. Webster dared to assert that he believed in the justice of the whole American claim, and furthermore that he did not show the map aforesaid to Lord Ashburton.

But before we acknowledge the justice of this sentence of annihilation there are several things to be considered. The first of these is that Dr. Franklin, with all his wisdom, did not happen to be infallible, and that the tract about which so much dispute has arisen, was not, in 1783-4 considered worth talking about; and that therefore the Dr. might, and very probably did, think more of making a strong red line, than an accurate one. The second fact is that this entire situation is by fearfully perplexed interpretation of the language of the treaty, nor does it seem to be even with the modern claim of Great Britain, now with the "chain of Highlands" which this same Mr. Featherstonhaugh, who published the pamphlet which has made the brawn, sweated on paper, in default of finding it in Maine.

Dr. Franklin's red line is then but one man's opinion, carelessly given probably, about a matter at that time deemed of little consequence. It is entitled to no official weight or character. And now, as to Mr. Webster's "duplicity." It is a new doctrine in diplomacy, that a negotiator is bound to furnish arguments for both sides of a question, even if it were supposed that Mr. W. believed in the importance of this testimony; and it would be equally new to maintain that every title is to be furnished by opponents to opponents, for their own defeat. Mr. Webster probably puts the same estimate on this map that we have been given it.

But if it was Mr. Webster's duty to have assisted Lord Ashburton to make out his case, it was no less Ashburton's duty to assist Webster. His Lordship should therefore have brought over that old English map, in which the line, as the people of Maine claimed it before the treaty, is not marked with a pen, but engraved and printed as part of the original map. Such charts do exist, and if Lord Ashburton did not know it before he came here, Mr. Webster was not the man to let him remain in ignorance of it after he arrived.

It is said that this red line marked map was produced in the Senate, to dragoon Senators into voting for the Treaty, for fear they might fare worse by a new negotiation. This may be true—and true or false, has nothing to do with the merits of the question. For our own part, having studiously investigated the subject while the Boundary was yet an open question, we can honestly say that, according to all natural interpretation of the language of the Treaty, and all collateral and direct testimony bearing upon it, the line claimed by Maine, it appears evident to us, was the line of the Treaty. We have given, instead of obtained territory by the Treaty of Washington. As an offset to the British newspapers, we give the opinion and sentiments of a British statesman—an opposition member too, who was bound to find fault with the Treaty, if he could. We refer to BROUGHAM.

"In debate in the House of Lords, on the answer to the Queen's Speech, Lord Brougham referred to the Treaty between the United States and Great Britain as indeed nearly all the speakers did—and said concerning the Boundary adjustment—'As to the terms of that settlement—as to the territory which is affected by the line of boundary that we have heard so much talked of to-night, and much more said, and less wisely talked of out doors, I profess for myself to be of this opinion—(a heresy, I doubt not, that will be questioned by some perhaps, of my noble friends behind me)—I am infinitely overvalue, perhaps, in importance, the vital importance, to the interests of this country and of mankind at large, of a good understanding, of a cordial friendly feeling being restored between this country and the kindred people of America, that I care not how little of boundary is drawn. I am utterly indifferent what direction that line takes; let it go a few miles or leagues to the right hand or to the left, even let it affect Cape Ann, even let it offset the navigation of the St. John's river—welcome! take it all. Give it up! Give no pause between America and England.' His Lordship goes on to say, however, that he is not left to that, in defending the treaty. He considers the settlement fair and just, and pays compliment to Lord Ashburton for the happy success of his negotiation."

If, however, "interesting paragraphs" in newspapers could have created war, we should have been at it long ago; for the papers in neither country have failed in bellicose manifestations. They form a very harmless sort of standing army.

INTERESTING SUBJECT.

Phrenology, or, as it was originally and more properly termed craniology, is likely to do something worth while for the world, at last. Phrenology, so called, having directed attention to the palpable facts of the exterior of the head, and the shape of the skull, has made craniology a more scientifically pursued study. Now it is to be applied to antiquity. Dr. Morton, of this city, is preparing a work, which the Boston Medical Journal pronounces likely to possess an extraordinary interest for the antiquarian and physiologist, on the crania of the ancient Egyptians. Skulls have been put in his possession, belonging to a remote epoch, by Mr. George R. Glidden, late a resident of Cairo, who is now lecturing very acceptably in Boston, on the Archeology of Egypt, and he will thus be enabled to develope some remarkable facts in regard to the primitive inhabitants of the valley of the Nile. He will satisfactorily demonstrate that the builders of the pyramids were Caucasians. This will be an unexpected discovery to the historian, since the opinion has been propagated, from age to age, that the authors of the monumental hieroglyphics were Africans. That they were white men seems now placed beyond dispute by the erudite researches of Mr. Glidden.

NEW SPECULATION.

The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer mentions the successful culture of cotton from Louisiana, in the valley of Hesnoit; (Languedoc;) the quality produced is averred to be remarkably fine and white, and great hopes prevail of the extension of the new product in that district. There was a time, it will be remembered, when French best read regret were to render the West Indies superfluous dots in the Oceanic—but the lotus survive yet; and we suspect the cotton of Languedoc will not supersede the necessity of growing a little of the staple elsewhere. The East Indian speculation is an admitted failure, so far.

A PERFECT BRUTE.

In Boston, last week, a man, who was engaged on the wharf in managing the body of his brother, which had just been found floating in the dock, had his pocket picked of upwards of three dollars. The rascal who could do this, is entirely past redemption. If there is any time when a man can trust the sympathy and honesty of his fellows, one would think it must be while he is bowed down in grief; and if there is any crime more hateful than another, it is a breach of the trust of the afflicted.

THE NEW POSTAGE BILL.

The Bill originated by Mr. Rumsey to prohibit the running of private expresses, has passed unanimously. It proposes to prohibit absolutely the transmission of any matter other than the Mails, on a penalty of $100 for each offence, one-half to go to the informer and the balance to the Government. By a proviso, "nothing herein" is declared to mean "all letters and newspapers, and all newspapers, pamphlets periodically published, and all circulars and printed matter delivered and sent open or outside, shall and cannot one pound in weight." Journal heads accepted.

We should not allude to this matter, as it has been greatly clearly demonstrated to be unconstitutional, were it not that the New York Tribune makes the following application of the law. Mr. Graham is about devoting a more undivided attention to the important work alluded to. The Tribune says:

"Graham's Magazine, of Philadelphia, issues some 10,000 copies monthly, of which probably one-half are sent to subscribers by mail, and the balance sold by the single copy in the Cities and Towns of Pennsylvania; we hold tell; and before we have any tricks played us in the Oregon, let us send a fleet of heavy armed and well manned steamboats to pass out our rights in the fertile and valuable valley of the Columbia river."

And the London Sun, Third Edition, which issued Thursday No. 2, of the day on which the steamer sailed, says, that, in a certain event, "Mr. Webster will find, that, far from preserving peace, he has taken the most effectual means ever devised by a Minister, for plunging two countries in a deadly war." Probably, by this time, the reader begins to desire to know, what all this is about. We shall endeavor to satisfy him in as clear and concise a manner as possible.

It appears then, that at the request of a French Noblesman, Dr. Franklin, while in France, marked his idea of the Maine Boundary with a strong red line in a map—that Mr. Sparks, the historian found and procured this map, and sent it home to Washington—that there is no doubt whatever of its authenticity as the map which Dr. Franklin marked—and that there is as little doubt that Mr. Webster has seen it, and that it was the preferred in the Senate while the subject of certifying the treaty was under consideration. Dr. Franklin's line, moreover, gives the British more of the disputed territory than they ever claimed; and the charge of trickery, perversion, and thimble-rigging against the American is made because Mr. Webster dared to assert that he believed in the justice of the whole American claim, and furthermore that he did not show the map aforesaid to Lord Ashburton.

But before we acknowledge the justice of this sentence of annihilation there are several things to be considered. The first of these is that Dr. Franklin, with all his wisdom, did not happen to be infallible, and that the tract about which so much dispute has arisen, was not, in 1783-4 considered worth talking about; and that therefore Dr. Franklin, and very probably did, think more of making a strong red line, than an accurate one. The second fact is that this entire situation is by fearfully perplexed interpretation of the language of the treaty, nor does it seem to be even with the modern claim of Great Britain, now with the "chain of Highlands" which this same Mr. Featherstonhaugh, who published the pamphlet which has made the brawn, sweated on paper, in default of finding it in Maine.

Dr. Franklin's red line is then but one man's opinion, carelessly given probably, about a matter at that time deemed of little consequence. It is entitled to no official weight or character. And now, as to Mr. Webster's "duplicity." It is a new doctrine in diplomacy, that a negotiator is bound to furnish arguments for both sides of a question, even if it were supposed that Mr. W. believed in the importance of this testimony; and it would be equally new to maintain that every title is to be furnished by opponents to opponents, for their own defeat. Mr. Webster probably puts the same estimate on this map that we have been given it.

But if it was Mr. Webster's duty to have assisted Lord Ashburton to make out his case, it was no less Ashburton's duty to assist Webster. His Lordship should therefore have brought over that old English map, in which the line, as the people of Maine claimed it before the treaty, is not marked with a pen, but engraved and printed as part of the original map. Such charts do exist, and if Lord Ashburton did not know it before he came here, Mr. Webster was not the man to let him remain in ignorance of it after he arrived.

It is said that this red line marked map was produced in the Senate, to dragoon Senators into voting for the Treaty, for fear they might fare worse by a new negotiation. This may be true—and true or false, has nothing to do with the merits of the question. For our own part, having studiously investigated the subject while the Boundary was yet an open question, we can honestly say that, according to all natural interpretation of the language of the Treaty, and all collateral and direct testimony bearing upon it, the line claimed by Maine, it appears evident to us, was the line of the Treaty. We have given, instead of obtained territory by the Treaty of Washington. As an offset to the British newspapers, we give the opinion and sentiments of a British statesman—an opposition member too, who was bound to find fault with the Treaty, if he could. We refer to BROUGHAM.

"In debate in the House of Lords, on the answer to the Queen's Speech, Lord Brougham referred to the Treaty between the United States and Great Britain as indeed nearly all the speakers did—and said concerning the Boundary adjustment—'As to the terms of that settlement—as to the territory which is affected by the line of boundary that we have heard so much talked of to-night, and much more said, and less wisely talked of out doors, I profess for myself to be of this opinion—(a heresy, I doubt not, that will be questioned by some perhaps, of my noble friends behind me)—I am infinitely overvalue, perhaps, in importance, the vital importance, to the interests of this country and of mankind at large, of a good understanding, of a cordial friendly feeling being restored between this country and the kindred people of America, that I care not how little of boundary is drawn. I am utterly indifferent what direction that line takes; let it go a few miles or leagues to the right hand or to the left, even let it affect Cape Ann, even let it offset the navigation of the St. John's river—welcome! take it all. Give it up! Give no pause between America and England.' His Lordship goes on to say, however, that he is not left to that, in defending the treaty. He considers the settlement fair and just, and pays compliment to Lord Ashburton for the happy success of his negotiation."

If, however, "interesting paragraphs" in newspapers could have created war, we should have been at it long ago; for the papers in neither country have failed in bellicose manifestations. They form a very harmless sort of standing army.

INTERESTING SUBJECT.

Phrenology, or, as it was originally and more properly termed craniology, is likely to do something worth while for the world, at last. Phrenology, so called, having directed attention to the palpable facts of the exterior of the head, and the shape of the skull, has made craniology a more scientifically pursued study. Now it is to be applied to antiquity. Dr. Morton, of this city, is preparing a work, which the Boston Medical Journal pronounces likely to possess an extraordinary interest for the antiquarian and physiologist, on the crania of the ancient Egyptians. Skulls have been put in his possession, belonging to a remote epoch, by Mr. George R. Glidden, late a resident of Cairo, who is now lecturing very acceptably in Boston, on the Archeology of Egypt, and he will thus be enabled to develope some remarkable facts in regard to the primitive inhabitants of the valley of the Nile. He will satisfactorily demonstrate that the builders of the pyramids were Caucasians. This will be an unexpected discovery to the historian, since the opinion has been propagated, from age to age, that the authors of the monumental hieroglyphics were Africans. That they were white men seems now placed beyond dispute by the erudite researches of Mr. Glidden.

NEW SPECULATION.

The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer mentions the successful culture of cotton from Louisiana, in the valley of Hesnoit; (Languedoc;) the quality produced is averred to be remarkably fine and white, and great hopes prevail of the extension of the new product in that district. There was a time, it will be remembered, when French best read regret were to render the West Indies superfluous dots in the Oceanic—but the lotus survive yet; and we suspect the cotton of Languedoc will not supersede the necessity of growing a little of the staple elsewhere. The East Indian speculation is an admitted failure, so far.

A PERFECT BRUTE.

In Boston, last week, a man, who was engaged on the wharf in managing the body of his brother, which had just been found floating in the dock, had his pocket picked of upwards of three dollars. The rascal who could do this, is entirely past redemption. If there is any time when a man can trust the sympathy and honesty of his fellows, one would think it must be while he is bowed down in grief; and if there is any crime more hateful than another, it is a breach of the trust of the afflicted.

THE MILLER ABDUCTION.

This case continues to excite attention in New York. It seems that the pub does not wish to live with the husband, while the husband insists that the wife shall, forsooth, forgive, or charged with having stolen from him $20,000, and having purchased the forgery to his wife, while he was labouring under religious enthusiasm. We find the New York papers divided upon this subject, some of them treating the forgery charge as ridiculous. It is a singular case, altogether. The guilt of Mr. Miller, if he be guilty, never can be proved without producing the note in evidence. He charges his wife on the other hand, with having been induced to tamper up this charge by her connections.

LATE FROM MEXICO.

The Congressionists still defend their city against the Mexican army, and, it would appear, with no little pertinacity to the latter. It is stated that the Mexicans having fortified themselves on the heights of Gilaina, overlooking Cumpanchy, were driven thence on the 1st of February by the Campanchenos, the latter being only some 70 men, while the Mexicans lost 600, among whom were their general, and a son of Santa Ana. The Campanchenos, it is stated, are therefore in high spirits, and are about to decline Yucatan from for ever, and adopt a national standard. Com. Moore, with the Texan fleet, was expected soon to arrive to their assistance.

VERY FOOLISH.

We noticed a few weeks since the disappearance of a newly wedded bride, Mrs. Anna La Cross, from Lansingburgh. Mrs. Cross has since returned, having only gone to make a visit to some of her friends. She was very foolish to do this without advising her husband thereof; he was very foolish in making a public view about it; and the newspapers are very foolish in making continentally mountains of mole hills. A woman cannot now-a-days go to market, or a man to a caucus, but the first thought of whoever may hear of the "mysterious circumstance," is to put it in the newspapers.

THE COLDEST YET.

The Norwalk (Conn.) Gazette says: "We understand that the weather has been so intensely cold during the past week, on the line of the Housatonic Railroad, that the water in the boiler of the locomotive actually congealed while the engine was in operation, and the train was brought to a dead stand!" Freezing up a locomotive, while under a full head of steam, is certainly a new idea. It beats bare wood coemaker needs. We are not informed by the Gazette whether the fire frose under the boiler, but the inference is certainly in favor of that supposition.

A FACT FOR THE LADIES.

The New York correspondent of the National Intelligencer, writing about the fast trotting horses attached to the sleighs of that city, which go at the rate of a mile in three minutes, says: "A couple of these velocitrots met at a corner last week, and skewered a lady through, and nearly killed the gentleman who was driving her—the lady only saved from death by some of her belongings of such a substantial character. It would be worth while, if the world were going to last much longer, to 'manufacture a little public opinion' on this subject."

REV. MR. BETHUNE.

The lecture of this gentleman in Baltimore was justly appreciated by his audience, and the Press bore fitting testimony to its excellence. The American says:—"His subject—Holland!—was elaborately and beautifully treated, embracing a wide and critical range of historical information. Those who had either a remote or immediate connection with, or interest in the country that formed the theme of the lecturer's discourse, could not be other than pleased, as well with the justness of his remarks as with the style and forcible character of his oratory.

RUSSIAN PUNISHMENTS.

By a recent order of the Emperor, the punishment of a convicted felon convicted in Russia is decreed to be running the gauntlet six times before some thousand soldiers, and, in the event of his surviving, (!) twenty-one years' labor in the Siberian mines! Russia is behind the age. The imposition of barbarous and terrible punishments degrades men to brutes—not merely the sufferers we mean, but a nation. Perhaps, however, want of intellect is rather a recommendation, then otherwise, to a Russian subject.

PROFITABLE.

The number of letters brought by the Acadia is estimated at 30,000; which would yield at only twenty-five cents each, the sum of $7,500. They will probably average much higher than twenty-five cents, and yield not far from $20,000. The British Government can well afford to pay Cunard £60,000 per annum for mail transportation. We doubt, however, if, as passages have been averaging for the last year, whether Mr. Cunard finds that this £60,000 makes up his deficiencies. A steam ship is a costly vehicle.

COMMODORE PORTER.

The whole nation will be pained to hear that Com. Porter is probably now no more. At the latest dates he was so ill, at Constantinople, that little hope was entertained of his recovery. He was one of the most dashing and able officers in the service, until he was sacrificed for a point of etiquette. Capt. Dorr for the same sort of offence in the British navy, much more important, will be made, in the end, an admiral. Justice will probably be done to the character of Porter, when he is no more.

VALUABLE AUTOGRAPHS.

A correspondent of the Boston American, states that the Penobscot Indians have in their possession several autograph letters from Gen. Washington, addressed to them, urging their neutrality while the contest for our independence was raging. We dare say these red men put more value upon the relics than many white men would. There is too little sentiment in the Anglo-American character. Running away from John Bull's sway is the worship of the pure, we have gone too far and too fast.

BANKRUPTS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

In the District Court of the United States in Massachusetts, (says the Boston Daily Advertiser,) the amount of funds deposited in the Court, arising from the estates of Bankrupts since the law went into operation, is $142,700, of which there has been distributed $66,400. The number of bankrupts is over 2000, and the number of papers which have been filed in bankruptcy is over 75,000.

FROM BUENOS AYRES.

The latest intelligence from Buenos Ayres contains nothing new about the operations of the cruiser; but gives us the intelligence that the British Minister had addressed to the Governor of Buenos Ayres a letter announcing on behalf of the Governments of Great Britain and France, that the sanguinary war now existing between the governments of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo must cease.

FRENCH POLICY.

Capt. Adams of the ship Brandt, informs the editor of the New Bedford Mercury, that the French had actually taken possession of the Society Group of Islands in the Pacific Ocean. We are willing to admit the ability of Louis—but we must acknowledge that is a foolish monarch, we should consider both the Marquesas' colonial speculation, and this later one, but new proofs of folly.

USEFUL TOYS.

Mr. H. L. Lipman, of 133 Chesnut street, has got up an exceedingly useful description of toy. It is a set of beautiful Britannia letters, over one hundred in number—capital to teach children to read, and not bad as an amusement for their seniors, in the making of anagrams and other female diversions. We hope the inventor will realize a wide sale for this neat affair.

A LONG STRETCH.

The English papers state that immense flocks of pigeons, supposed to be travellers from America, recently made their appearance in the vicinity of Cumberland. How the fact was reached that they went from this country is not stated. They probably have fallen in with the travelling spirit of the age. We wish John Bull would send us a few larks in return.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF GEOGRAPHY.

We call attention to the advertisement in our paper of the Encyclopædia of Geography, and beg to state that the work can be furnished by William H. Graham, No. 98 Chesnut street, where can also be had the Medical Journal and News, at the publisher's prices. All the current serials and periodicals are for sale at the same place.

COMMODORE HULL.

The Bostonians are determined not to be defaulters in their testimonies of respect to Commodore Hull. A subscription is on foot to erect a Naval Monument to his memory in the Cemetery at Mount Auburn. On the Monday following his funeral, sixty-nine guns were fired on Boston Common as a token of respect.

☞ The Maine Senate has received, by a vote of 16 to 9 to tax railroads or real estate.

HARD TIMES FOR COOPERS.

It was stated in the New York Legislature a day or two ago, that "the salutary and wide spread reformation from intemperance has so reduced the market for whiskey barrels, that the sales have fallen off ninety per cent." The coopers must turn their attention to the manufacture of meal tubs, beef and pork barrels, and other vessels to contain the consumption of fish, a proper proportion of which has been so long superseded by potatoes. It is truly cheerful to witness the solid comfort which has taken the place, in so many families, of former destitution.

Correspondence.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE OF THE SATURDAY POST.

A LETTER TO THE EDITOR, DATED
Bristol, England, February 2nd, 1843.

There is a previous piece of work here about a certain "red line map," found in the public archives of Paris, and marked by Dr. Franklin sixty years ago, to show the boundary between the United States and the British Provinces. By this document, it is affirmed, that the whole of the Disputed Territory belonged to Great Britain, that the United States Senate and Government were in possession of this map when they ratified the Treaty—and that, therefore, they unfairly claimed land which they must have known at the time, did not belong to them. You have no idea how we are be-rated in the English papers for this negotiation, which

United States SATURDAY POST.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, &c.

☞ Per annum—$2 if paid in advance; $1.25 in advance for six months.

Postmasters are requested to frank their letters addressed to us. The word "free" or "mail" is not a frank.

Agents will please endorse their letters with their name or initials.

Other letters will not be taken from the Post office unless the postage is paid.

Papers discontinued only at the end of the current half year's subscription, and then only at the option of the Publisher if arrearages are due.

Small Bank Notes of solvent Banks received in payment for our bills.

Agents are earnestly solicited to make quick remittances, without which it is difficult to keep accounts correct. They should always give names and time paid for.

Any persons forwarding Ten Dollars current, free of postage, in advance, will be entitled to seven copies.

Removals should always state the Post office removed from, as well as to which the paper is to be addressed.

LIST OF AGENTS.

☞ The following agents will still act for the Saturday Post, under the new publishing arrangement.

☞ TRAVELLING AGENTS for Graham's magazine, United States Saturday Post, and Lady's World of Fashion—

Mr. C. W. JAMES, of Harrison street, Cincinnati, Ohio, is our Agent for Ohio, Indiana and Michigan, assisted by Moses Meeker, Jos. R. Smith, G. H. Comstock, J. R. Humphreys and J. T. Pratt.

SAMUEL H. STEVENSON, assisted by James H. Stevenson and John F. Johnson, for Kentucky.

HERBERT M. LEWIS is collecting for us in Alabama and Tennessee.

ISRAEL E. JAMES is Agent for us in the So. ch and South Western States and Florida, assisted by James K. Whipple, Wm. H. Weld, O. H. P. Stem, and Henry Pine.

WILLIAM A. PIERCE, collects for us in Pennsylvania, assisted by James Pierce.

JAS. F. EASTON is collecting for us in Missouri, Illinois, and parts of Wisconsin and Iowa.

ALANSON BILLINGS, of Nashville, Tenn., is duly authorized to obtain new subscribers to Graham's Magazine, United States Saturday Post, and Lady's World. Single copies may also be had at his store in Nashville.

Notices of New Works.

THE FARMERS' ENCYCLOPEDIA AND DICTIONARY OF RURAL AFFAIRS, embracing all the recent discoveries in AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY, adapted to the comprehension of unscientific readers, by CUTBERT W. JOHNSON. Enlarged, improved and adapted to the United States, by a PRACTICAL FARMER, assisted by numerous scientific gentlemen. No. 1, (to be completed in sixteen numbers at 25 cents each,) with beautiful engravings. Carey & Hart, Philadelphia.

The thanks of our country friends are due Messrs. Carey & Hart, the publishers of this important book on Agriculture, for the elegant manner in which it is issued, and the extremely low price at which it is offered. The work will consist of upwards of one thousand closely printed 8vo. pages, printed on good paper in a clear legible type, and illustrated with SIXTEEN BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVINGS of horses, cattle, sheep, and implements of grain, the most valued grasses, the seeds of agriculture, &c. &c.; besides numerous wood cuts of agricultural implements, &c. &c. It will be issued in 16 semi-monthly numbers, at 25 cents each, or four dollars for the entire work. The first number now before us is illustrated by a beautiful engraving of short horned cattle, which alone is worth the cost of the number.

The value of the English work upon which this is based, is well known to many of our intelligent readers; but from the high price at which it is sold, $14, and containing as it does much matter of local interest, its circulation in this country has been confined to a very narrow sphere, the wealthy or amateur farmer. The editor of the American work, whom we know personally, and whom we believe, from his experience and indefatigable industry, to be fully competent, has not confined himself to his own knowledge, but has availed himself of the experience and knowledge of some of our most successful agriculturists, and culled from the best authorities such material as would render his work most acceptable to that class for whom it is specially designed, THE AGRICULTURISTS OF AMERICA.

The work is one which has long been wanted; a work which a farmer may consult on any emergency, and study with profit in his spare moments. It will not be a mere Dictionary of technicalities, but will contain a series of essays, by able hands, on the most important subjects in Agriculture, including the latest information on Agricultural Chemistry, Manures, the Improvement of Cattle, &c. &c.

TABLES OF INTEREST AND EXCHANGE. By George Oakes.—The title page of this work expresses its value and uses; and the verdict of practical men has endorsed the truth of its pretensions. In the tables are shown the interest on any sum from $1 to $10,000, at six, seven, and eight per cent. per annum, from one day to ninety-four days, from four months to eleven months, and from one year to six years consecutively, both for three hundred and sixty days, and for three hundred and sixty-five days to a year. Also, the value of Domestic Exchange, for any sum from $1 to $10,000, at any rate of premium or discount, from one-eighth of one per cent. (by one-eighths) to ten per cent.; and how any sum may be invested or absorbed in a bill of exchange, at the same rate of premium and discount. And also the value, in Federal money, of Sterling Exchange, for any sum from £1 to £10,000, at any rate of premium or discount, from one-eighth of one per cent. (by one-eighths) to ten per cent.; and how any sum in Federal money may be invested or absorbed in a sterling bill, at any of these rates of premium and discount.

The book is presented in a compact form, and outside and in seems the proper and acceptable remote of the counting house. It may be obtained of Messrs. Carey & Hart; Grigg & Elliott; and Thomas, Cowperthwaite & Co.

TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE AND LITERARY REPOSITORY.—We are pleased to perceive by a notice in a late number of this periodical, that its publication has been transferred by Mr. Levin to Samuel C. Atkinson & Co., No. 60 South Third street, above Chestnut. As the editor of a Temperance Journal, Mr. Levin, who continues to conduct the Advocate, is unexceeded in success. He has the ability to make his paper interesting to all readers, and his caustic and playful wit gives the Advocate an air of sprightliness which is irresistible; while like a skilful general he so disposes the heavy artillery of facts, that the rallies of the light troops of humor are well followed up. And as to Mr. Atkinson, if we wish to find any body to whom to introduce him as a publisher, we presume it would be necessary to go out of the country to do it; as there can hardly be any person in the United States who is not familiar with his name. Success to the whole concern.

THE BOOK OF THE NAVY.—No. 3 of this work, now publishing by the Appleton's, in the serial form, contains an account of the affair of the Constitution and Guerriere, attention to which has been recently revived by the death of the commander in that engagement. It is a pleasant fact that during Commodore Hull's first visit up the Mediterranean, Captain, now Admiral Decrès, and Commodore Hull, had an earnest an encounter of courtesy, and we believe of true friendship, as they once had of warlike strife. But this is not talking about the book, which deserves all that has been said in its recommendation.

TALES AND SKETCHES. By Nathaniel Greene. Boston: Little & Brown. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton.—This is a very pleasant volume of translations made by Nathaniel Greene, Esq., late Postmaster of Boston. Mr. Green, in his translations, has the rare and happy faculty of making the matter transferred look and feel as much at home in English as if it had been born and bred there; while it loses none of the spirit of the original, and none of the essential traits which mark its real parentage. In a word, his translations appear like the utterance of foreigners speaking our tongue perfectly.

MURRAY'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GEOGRAPHY. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard.—This is a neat edition of Murray's standard work, revised with additions, by Thomas G. Bradford. Of the book itself it is almost unnecessary to speak. Containing near 1900 pages, with eleven hundred engravings, and eighty maps, its price has hitherto precluded the extensive circulation which it deserved. Published now in twenty-four semi-monthly parts, at 25 cents each, the mode of payment will be easy, and the circulation large.

LADY'S MUSICAL LIBRARY. Edited by Charles Jarvis, Professor of Music.—The March number of this periodical has been sent us by the publishers, Messrs. Gedey & McMichael. It contains the usual pleasant variety of music, recherche and familiar, and is already on its way to delight thousands of firesides. The price of the work is three dollars per annum, and for this sum is furnished what would cost, at the usual prices, nearly fifty dollars!

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT.—The second number of Lea & Blanchard's edition of Martin Chuzzlewit is out. It is printed in monthly numbers, uniform with the former works of Boz, published by the same house, and illustrated. It is the best edition for perusal.

MASTERMAN READY. By Captain Marryatt. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton.—This is the third and last volume of a very clever book for children and youth. The lessons it inculcates are good, and the events and scenes which it presents are such as can be easily and readily embraced by the mind. In reading Mastermen Ready, one almost forgets what course and vile traits of mind the author has exhibited in other volumes.

SERIALS, &c.—We are indebted to Burgess & Zieber for several of the publications of the current month: Burgess's Magazine, the Artist, the Knickerbocker, the Ladies' Companion, Democratic Review, Blackwood for February, &c. &c. This reminds us to say, that every thing going may be had of our neighbors. The last publication in the novel line is Adam Brown, the Merchant, by Horace Smith. It is an amusing book.

URE'S DICTIONARY. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton.—Part IV. of the monthly re-issue of the standard work has been laid upon our table. Under the heads of "Arts, Manufactures and Mines," it embraces in convenient shape for reference a fund of information, some portion of which is useful to every man in every situation in life. It is illustrated and explained with over twelve hundred engravings.

THE ECLECTIC, for March, has made its appearance, and is embellished with a mezzotint from Sir Thomas Lawrence's picture, the Girl and Flowers. Every number is hereafter to be illustrated with a steel engraving. The Eclectic is edited by J. H. Agnew, and contains an admirable selection of foreign literature, well worthy of the attention of the friends of both the works of which it is an union.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER. Philadelphia: Burgess & Zieber.—The February number of this magazine opens with a brief and feeling obituary of its late publisher, T. W. White. The contents are of the usual character of the work—the style of getting up, which has conferred upon it a solid and proud reputation.

HECTOR O'HALLORAN, Part X. of the illustrated edition is just published by Appleton. This is a very good story indeed.

THE NEWGATE CALENDER has been commenced by Wemyss, in parts, at 12½ cents each, and each complete in itself.

Agricultural.

FRUIT TREES.—The Chinese have the following plan of propagating fruit trees. Cut a ring of bark about an inch in width, from a bearing branch, surround the place with a ball of fat earth, or loam, bound fast to the branch with a piece of matting; over this suspend a pot or horn with water in it, having a small hole in the bottom just sufficient to let the water drop, in order to keep the earth constantly moist. The branch throws new roots into the earth just above the place where the ring of bark was stripped off. The operation must be performed in the spring, and the limb or branch should be sawed off and planted out at the fall of the leaf the ensuing autumn.

ASPARAGUS.—The gardeners at Nice, improve upon asparagus in the following manner:—Take a quart wine bottle; invert it over the head of a stalk of asparagus just rising from the ground, and secure it by three sticks so that it cannot be knocked over. If left in this state, the asparagus will grow up into the interior of the bottle, and, being stimulated by the unusual heat and moisture it is then exposed to, will speedily fill it. As soon as this has taken place, the bottle must be broken, and the asparagus removed, when it will be found to have formed a thick head of tender delicate shoots, all eatable, and as compact as a cauliflower.

TO FEED FOWLS.—Corn given to fowls should be crushed and soaked in water:—this helps digestion; and hens will lay in winter that are so fed that would not otherwise. Feed your fowls in winter with bones powdered fine, and they will need less corn and lay as plentiful as any season of the year. The bones supply the carbonate of lime, which is necessary for the production of the shell, and a part of the yolk of the egg. Egg shells, oyster shells, chalk, or unburnt lime answers a similar purpose.

☞ Delaware, (the smallest State in the Union,) we are inclined to think, "takes the lead" in big pigs—for we learn from the Delaware State Journal that Thos. Massey, Jr. of Newcastle Hundred, raised one, the past year, that weighed (alive) twelve hundred pounds!

TREES.—By felling the trees that cover the tops and sides of mountains, (says Humboldt,) many in every clime prepare at once two calamities for future generations—want of fuel and scarcity of water.

Religious Intelligence.

PUTTSVILLE.—The Miner's Journal says:—"A powerful religious excitement is operating in this borough, at the present time. Service is held nightly in all the different churches, and a spirit of revival is making rapid strides among our people. The Methodist Church, under the pastorship of the Rev. Wm. Barnes, has had an accession to the membership of from two to three hundred. The other congregations have also increased in numbers and are still increasing."

☞ Very liberal collections were made on Sunday last, at most of our Episcopal Episcopal Churches, in behalf of the Mission Fund. At St. Peter's, the amount raised was between $1200 and $1300.

☞ The Journal of Commerce states that sixty-three persons were baptized in the East River on Sunday, and added to the Norfolk street church, under the charge of the Rev. George Benedict.

CINCINNATI.—An Agricultural Society has just been formed in the "Queen City." We are surprised that it has not been done before.

☞ Bishop Griswold, in the course of his life, ordained no less than 128 priests, 171 deacons, and confirmed 12,104 persons.

☞ There has been a cheering revival among the religious societies of Bridgeton, N. J.

Congress News.

In the Senate, on Wednesday February 25d, Mr. Walker's resolutions relative to State debts, were laid upon the table, 27 to 18, on account of the approaching close of the session. The remainder of the day was spent upon the Navy Appropriation Bill.

On Thursday, Feb. 24d, a report adverse, and a minority report favorable, were made upon the subject of the Warehouse System. A report was also made adverse to the bill reducing the number, &c. of the New York Custom House officers. It proposes in lieu of the bill, to pass one limiting the expenses of the Custom House to $200,000 annually, and leaving the details to the proper department.

Mr. Archer brought up the Ashburton Treaty, by reading the following extract from a despatch of Mr. Everett, our Minister in London:

"Parliament was opened by commission yesterday. The Queen's speech and the very interesting debates upon the addresses in the two Houses, will be found in the papers of to-day, which accompany this despatch. I attended the debate in the House of Commons. You can judge of the surprise with which I listened to the remarks of Sir Robert Peel on the alleged fact that Lord Aberdeen's letter to me of the 30th of December, 1841, remained to this day "unacknowledged and unanswered." It was acknowledged by me in a note dated two days afterwards, (23d Dec. 1841,) which, however unimportant, was transmitted to Mr. Fox by Lord Aberdeen, and afterwards communicated to Parliament and printed.

"In this note of acknowledgment I informed Lord Aberdeen that I should avail myself of an early opportunity of making some remarks on the very important topics treated in this letter. I pursued this course of an immediate acknowledgment of the receipt of Lord Aberdeen's note, with notice of a purpose of replying in due season to its contents, because, being just arrived at my post, I had not received the instructions which you informed me I might soon expect on this topic, and which, as Lord Aberdeen's note modified the ground and disclaimed the language of his predecessor, it was my duty to await. Such instructions I should, no doubt, in due time have received; but on the 27th of December, Lord Aberdeen informed me that the special mission had been determined on; that Lord Ashburton would go to America, with full power to settle every point in discussion, including what was called the right of search, which he deemed the most difficult; and expressed the opinion that it would hardly be worth while for us to continue the correspondence on matters in dispute between the two countries; and, though he was willing to consider and reply to any statement I might think proper to make on any subject pending the negotiation that might take place at Washington, he supposed no benefit could result from a simultaneous discussion here.

"Such were Lord Aberdeen's observations, as reported by me in my despatch of December, 31.

"The negotiation took place, and a mode of dealing with and settling the question was happily agreed upon, which made it unnecessary to resume the discussion so long continued upon the subject. In fact, from the moment the special mission was announced, I considered the discussion as at an end, and as little to be resumed in reference to search and visitation to the Boundary or the 'Caroline.'"

(By referring to last week's Saturday Post, a report of the speech of Sir Robert Peel will be found.)

The reading of the above despatch being in a manner informal, no direct question could be taken upon it. But when the Navy Appropriation Bill came up, Mr. Benton attacked the Ashburton Treaty, by moving the striking out of the appropriation for an African Squadron, inserted in pursuance of the treaty. Mr. Archer observed that Great Britain had never relinquished the right of visit. On this point Sir Robert Peel spoke correctly. But the right of search had been abandoned, and there was no probability that it would be exercised. Mr. Benton responded, and the substance of his remarks is thus given by one of the letter writers:

"He declared that he would not discuss the question as one of interstitial law. The only matter which he would consider was the Treaty. The two parties to it construed it differently. Which of them was right? This was a question involving, perhaps, peace or war, and the answer both parties would take a stand the better. He desired, before any measure for executing the treaty were adopted, this question should be settled. As a practical one, one of primary importance, and involving a momentous issue, it ought to be settled. He understood the treaty of 1842 to concede both the right of search and of visitation. Great Britain had abandoned all idea of interference with our vessels. Such was the view taken of the matter by the President in his message. But Sir Robert Peel made this distinction between the right of search and visitation. Mr. Benton was anxious to know what course the President intended to pursue, and meanwhile the Senate must wait."

Mr. Buchanan had the same understanding of the Treaty as Mr. Benton. Mr. Henderson also concurred with Mr. B. Mr. Archer mentioned that the two governments put the same construction on the treaty, and that the difference which Senators entertained to point out did not exist. "Great Britain," he said, "having long contended for the right of visitation and search, abandoned the latter by the treaty and would not exercise the former." Mr. Allen followed in a fiery speech, and Mr. Evans on the other hand deprecated the loss of time by an unreasonable debate. Mr. Calhoun followed:

"He considered the debate premature, the Senate not having sufficient information upon the subject. Mr. Calhoun read extracts from Sir Robert Peel's speech, to show that the expressions attributed to him were susceptible of different constructions. Mr. C. contended that by executing the treaty we should only carry out our principles when we declare the slave trade to be piracy. He did not believe that Great Britain would violate her good faith. And he asked if we should do so by violating all the forms of natural law and custom, by resisting the execution of the treaty."

Several other gentlemen spoke, and the debate was at length concluded, by the rejection of Mr. Benton's amendment, and the passage of the bill.

On Friday, Feb. 24th, the Senate was called up again by a resolution of Mr. Benton calling for correspondence relative to it. [The resolution was passed on Saturday.] A communication was received from the President covering certain documents relative to the Quintuple Treaty. The Bankrupt Repeal Bill was for a short time debated. A report was received from the Committee of Conference upon the single point in the Army Bill, (in relation to West Point) in dispute between the two Houses. The Committee recommend adherence to the Senate amendment, in which, of course, the Senate concurred.

On Saturday, Feb. 25th, all attempts to save the Bankrupt Bill by amendment were lost, and the House Repeal Bill was passed, as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crafts, Dixon, Dudley, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Rives, Sevier, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—31.

Nays—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Choate, Evans, Kerr, Miller, Porter, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—13.

The Retrenchment Bill was reported to the Senate by Mr. Morehead, Chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment. The reduction in the pay and mileage of members, adopted by the Senate committee, is 12½ per cent. The same rate of reduction is understood, applied to the salaries of all officers of the army and navy, and civil department, above $1200.

HOUSE.—Wednesday, Feb. 23d, Mr. Adams moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to present a petition. Refused, 100 to 80. A resolution was offered by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, and adopted, calling for correspondence relative to the Treaty of Washington. The Navy Pension Bill and the Indian Appropriation Bill were passed, as also the Bill making appropriations for fortifications. Several Executive communications were received and referred, and, among them, one in answer to a call of the House for the authority of Capt. Thos. A.D. Jones in invading the territory of Mexico. The Executive disclaimed all connivance of the act, and said Capt. J. had been recalled therefor; he also sent all letters and papers which were pertinent to the subject. They were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Thursday, Feb. 23d.—A bill to establish a National Foundry was read twice and referred to Committee of the Whole. A Bill appropriating $30,000 to test the system of Electro-magnetic Telegraphs, was passed.

The unfinished business was then taken up, being Mr. J. R. Ingersoll's motion to print 10,000 copies of his Report, and Mr. Pope spoke at large on the subject of the proposed loan and the State debts.

The House then resolved into Committee of the Whole, and discussed the Bill making appropriations for various improvements of harbors, etc. After the debate, which was protracted, a number of amendments were rejected, and the Bill was finally laid on the table. The House then adjourned at a late hour.

Friday, Feb. 24th.—The Bill making appropriations for certain harbors, and for the Cumberland Road, was laid on the table, yeas 107 nays 87. The Bill to suspend, for a limited time, so much of the Appropriation Bill as relates to the election of Representatives by Districts was rejected, yeas 90, nays 91. A motion to re-consider was lost, yeas 93, nays 100. The Bill relative to the taking of testimony in the case of contested elections, amended so as to restore it to its original shape, as introduced at the last session, was passed, yeas 105, nays 85.

The General Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and occupied the House during Friday and Saturday.

IN SENATE, Monday, Feb. 27.—The whole day, or nearly the whole was spent in debating a bill to authorize the printing of the reports of the debates of Congress; and the Senate went into executive session without determining the question.

In the House, the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was debated in Committee of the Whole till a late hour, when it was reported to the House, with amendments. A message was received from the President, which with the accompanying papers, was ordered printed. [The Message will be found in another column.]

IN SENATE Feb 28, House Bills were reported—for the re-issue of Treasury notes; to appropriate forty thousand dollars for a mission to China.

The bill to amend the laws respecting imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia, was passed. This bill makes provision for the relief of Amos Kendall.

The bill to reduce the rates of postage to five and ten cents upon each letter, ten cents to be the greatest rate of postage for all distances above thirty miles, was taken up, and several amendments adopted.

The Fortification Bill from the House was amended, and ordered to be engrossed.

The Naval Pension Bill was passed with an amendment.

The bill to limit and reduce the franking privilege was laid on the table.

The bill from the House to provide for carrying into effect the Treaty of Washington was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

IN THE HOUSE, a large number of bills from the Senate were read twice and referred.

Mr. Kennedy, of Md., from the Committee on Commerce, made a report on the subject of memorials which had been referred to it from a general convention of the friends of African colonization, concluding with joint resolutions to appoint an agent to proceed to Africa, empowered to form treaties or conventions with the native tribes for the advancement of American Commerce, and the suppression of the slave trade—and that the Secretary of State report thereon at the next session. After some conversation the usual number of copies were ordered printed.

The Army Bill was settled by the report of a Committee of Conference, and sent to the President for his signature.

The Bill to carry the Washington Treaty into effect was passed.

The Civil and Diplomatic Association Bill was taken out of Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Adams, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of Texas to the United States, and, as an individual member of the Committee, submitted two resolutions against the annexation of Texas. The resolutions, objections being made, were not received.

Pennsylvania Legislature.

According to the laudable custom of the Legislature of this State, the 22d, the birth day of the Father of his Country, was kept as a holiday. The farewell of Washington to his countrymen was read, and no business was transacted.

IN SENATE, Feb. 23d, a communication relative to pauper law was received from the Secretary of the Commonwealth. [This is noticed in another place.] The question of printing the Governor's Veto Message on the Apportionment Bill was debated, and, the number being reduced to 500, was at length passed.

Mr. Ewing introduced a resolution favorable to the repeal of all laws relating to fugitive slaves; which was laid on the table.

A resolution passed two readings in favor of adjourning on the 20th of March, and was sent to the House.

The bill to suspend appropriations to colleges, academies, and female seminaries, came up, and was debated until the close of the morning session.

The whole of the afternoon was spent in discussing the bill to remove the Seat of Justice of Columbia County from Danville to Bloomsburg, which was finally negatived by a vote of 24 to 8.

Friday, Feb. 24, a bill was introduced by Mr. McCully to legalize certain proceedings of the borough authorities of West Philadelphia.

The Nicholson Court Bill; was returned to the House with new amendments.

The bill to withdraw for five years the appropriations to college, academies and female seminaries was discussed the remainder of the day.

Saturday, Feb. 25.—Bills were reported to extend the auction laws to Berks and Fayette.

Mr. Hendley reported a bill to apportion the State into Senatorial and Representative districts. It gives Philadelphia city two Senators and four members; Philadelphia county three Senators and eight members.

Mr. Penniman offered a preamble and resolution, setting forth that a resolution had passed the Senate some time since, calling on the Clerk of the Court of General Sessions for certain information relative to mode prosecutes, and that the said Clerk had disregarded it, and requesting the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas to make an order upon said Clerk, directing him to comply with the resolution. The resolution was adopted.

The bill to erect a new county out of parts of Columbia and Luzerne, was debated about an hour in final reading, and then referred to a Select Committee.

On motion of W. Wilcox, the Senate agreed to meet afternoons, on Monday, Tuesday and Friday.

The bill to withdraw the appropriations from Colleges, Academies, and Female Seminaries for five years, was next taken up, and discussed until the hour of adjournment.

IN THE HOUSE, Thursday, Feb. 23.—On motion of Mr. Sharwood, who presented a petition for the impeachment of the Governor, the Committee on that subject was required to make a report by Monday next.

Mr. Rockhill submitted the following, which was laid on the table:—

"Whereas, The State Treasurer has informed the House, in a communication dated the 11th instant, that he is at a loss to know the intent and meaning of a joint resolution passed the 6th day of February, 1843; and also that he has now in his hand the sum of $66,313 27, which he has received from the General Government, as agent appointed by the State to receive her share of the proceeds of sales of the Public Lands—Therefore,

Be it Resolved, &c., That so much of a joint resolution, passed the 6th day of February, 1843, as directs the State Treasurer to retain and hand over to the Auditor General to be cancelled, on the last day of every month, $100,000 of the Relief notes which shall come into the Treasury, shall be so construed as to require that at the end of each month $100,000 of said notes be cancelled; provided such sum remain in the Treasury after the payment of the ordinary appropriations. And the State Treasurer is hereby directed to place the sum of $66,313 27, (now in his hands as agent,) in the Treasury of the State, subject to ordinary appropriations."

Messrs. Linton and Hinchman introduced Appropriation Bills for Congressmen.

Mr. Barrett (Judiciary) reported adverse to the petition asking for a change in the Constitution so that no difference may be made among men, publicity, on account of color.

The Nicholson Court Bill—to abolish the Court and the Board of Commissioners—passed, with amendments.

Mr. James introduced a bill to prevent by severe penalties, seduction of special payments.

Friday, Feb. 24.—The vetoed Apportionment Bill was then taken up and debated until one o'clock, by Messrs. Morris, Hancock, McDaniels, Hood, Sharwood and Rosenkrot, against the veto and in favor of the bill; and by Messrs. Elwell, Lowry, Karns, James, and Brawley, in support of the veto.

In the afternoon a bill to incorporate a company to take charge of and keep the Erie Canal for twenty years, provided they will finish it, was passed through Committee of the Whole, and went as far as the 10th section on second reading, when the House adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 25.—The Veto Message was taken up directly after the reading of the journal, and the discussion commenced yesterday was continued by Messrs. Rosenkrot, Austin and Hancock, in favor of the bill, and by Mr. Lowry, and others, in support of the veto. The question being taken on the bill, it was lost—yeas 46, nays 41. All the members from the County voted for the bill, except Mr. McGowan.

Mr. Sharwood introduced a resolution providing that in the annual appropriation bill the different purposes for which money is appropriated shall be specified, which was adopted.

A joint resolution in favor of allowing the citizens of Philadelphia to vote for all their County officers on one ticket—passed. The measure came from Mr. Austin.

Mr. Hinchman introduced a bill to authorize the Mayor and Aldermen of Philadelphia to carry into effect certain trusts relating to wharves in the River Delaware. Also, an act concerning auctions.

Mr. Dolard introduced one to regulate the selling and keeping of merchandise. Several private bills were reported.

IN SENATE, Monday, Feb. 27.—The bill to erect a new district in Penn Township was reported as it passed the House. The bill to provide for the settlement of the interest on the public debt was finally passed and sent to the Governor.

The Auditor General was requested to inform the Senate what amount of delinquencies there have been by Public Officers within the last ten years; the names of the defaulters, &c.

The bill to suspend appropriations to Colleges, Academies and female Seminaries, was referred to the Committee on Education.

The bill to modify the act of last session, abolishing Imprisonment for Debt, passed Committee of the Whole, and was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill providing for the construction of an outlet Lock near Black Eddy on the Delaware Canal, occupied the remainder of the morning session. It is on second reading.

IN THE HOUSE, Monday, Feb. 27.—Among the petitions was one from Indian of Green county, asking that a tax may be laid upon bachelors.

Several resolutions were offered in relation to the issuing of the relief notes, lessening the monthly amount, or postponing the operation; but the House refused to consider them.

Mr. Hancock read in his place, better to secure the collection of recognizances in the county of Philadelphia, and the same was referred to the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. Tustin, the House took up and passed finally a bill requiring Constables in the county of Philadelphia, to serve notices on the retailers of merchandise of the amount at which they are rated, together with the time and place of holding the appeals.

Mr. Skinner submitted a joint resolution to amend the Constitution so as to provide that when a bill has been vetoed by the Governor, the same shall become a law, if passed afterwards by a MAJORITY of both Houses. Laid on the table.

The Erie Canal bill was then resumed on second reading, and debated until the time of adjournment, without making any further progress in it.

IN SENATE, Tuesday, Feb. 28, the bill to authorize the construction of an outlet lock at Black's Eddy, was taken up and debated at great length by Messrs. Kidder, Gibbons and Darsie in the affirmative, and Mr. Crabb in the negative, until near the close of the morning session, when it was laid over until to-morrow.

A bill to legalize certain proceedings of the borough authorities of West Philadelphia, was debated some time, and finally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the House, a bill providing for the following apportionment of Representatives passed a second reading, 59 to 36. It is thought that it will also pass the Senate.

1st—Southwark, Moyamensing, Passyunk, Kingsessing, Blockley, and West Philadelphia, of the County, and Cedar Ward, of the City of Philadelphia.

2d—The City of Philadelphia, except Cedar and Upper Delaware Wards.

3d—Northern Liberties, and Spring Garden, of the County, and Upper Delaware Ward of the City.

4th—Kensington, and the balance of the County of Philadelphia.

5th—Delaware and Montgomery.

6th—Bucks and Lehigh.

7th—Chester County.

8th—Lancaster County.

9th—Berks County.

10th—Northampton, Monroe, Pike and Wayne.

11th—Columbia, Luzerne and Wyoming.

12th—Bradford, Susquehanna and Tioga.

13th—Lycoming, Northumberland, Union and Clinton.

14th—Dauphin, Lebanon and Schuylkill.

15th—Adams and York.

16th—Cumberland, Perry and Franklin.

17th—Juniata and Huntingdon.

18th—Greene, Fayette and Somerset.

19th—Westmoreland, Bedford and Cambria.

20th—Washington and Beaver.

21st—Allegheny county.

22d—Venango, Mercer and Crawford.

23d—Erie, Warren, McKean, Potter and Jefferson.

24th—Butler, Armstrong, Clarion and Indiana.

A committee of conference was appointed on the part of both Houses to reconcile the differences about the interest bill.

JAUNDICE is generally accompanied with languor and inactivity, a kind of nothing or pitching pain over the whole body, difficulty of breathing, a bitter taste in the mouth, loathing of food, sickness of the stomach, flatulency, furred tongue, heartburn, distension of the stomach and bowels, costiveness, and other symptoms of indigestion.

Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills (Indian Purgatives) are always certain to remove the above unpleasant symptoms, and will, in all cases, if persevered with, make a perfect cure of Jaundice; because they carry off by the stomach and bowels the superabundance of bile; which, when interrupted in the downward passage, and taken into the circulation, is diffused through the whole system, giving a deep yellow color to the skin and eyes, and damaging all the functions of the body.

Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills will be found also to aid and improve digestion and purify the blood, and therefore will not only make a radical cure of Jaundice, but will at the same time give new life and vigor to the whole frame.

Beware of Counterfeits. The public are respectfully informed, that medicine purporting to be Indian Pills made by one Y. O. Fatek, are not the genuine Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills; and that all who will genuine, are provided with a certificate of agency, signed by William Wright, Vice Pres. of N. A. Coll. of Health.

Offers devoted exclusively to the sale of the medicine, wholesale and retail, number 169, RACE STREET, PHILADA., No. 289, Greenwich street, New York, and No. 194, Tremont Street, Boston. Also, for sale by Mr. Isaac P. Cook, No. 64 Baltimore street, Baltimore.

☞ Remember none are genuine except Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills.

SANDS SARSAPARILLA—SCROFULA.—Other diseases have their victims by their thousands, but Scrofula has slain its tens of thousands. This very alarming affection appears under a great variety of forms, from the slightest deviation from health to the most radical and general disease. One of its most common forms is tubercular phthisis pulmonalis, or consumption of the lungs; diseases of the hip and knee joint, and white swelling; also the glands of the neck and other parts of the body. Experience has shown that Sand's Sarsaparilla is a cure for the most inveterate complaint, and in numerous instances it has brought returning health and life where the vital spark had almost fled. From its preparation and peculiar combination with other vegetable substances, it operates by removing, in the first place, unhealthy action from diseased organs, substituting healthy action in its place, giving tone to the general energies of the system.

For particulars of its curative powers, see different advertisements in the daily papers.

Prepared and sold by A. B. Sands & Co., Druggists and Chemists, No. 372 Broadway, N. Y. Sold in Philadelphia by S. P. Thompson, corner 5th and Spruce sts.; by Dr. D. Jayne, 20 South 3d st., F. Kiest & Co., corner Second and Callowhill sts., and Frederick Brown, N. E. corner of Fifth and Chestnut sts. Price, $1 per bottle; 6 bottles for $5.

IMPORTANT WORK.—THE IMPROVEMENTS IN AGRICULTURE, ARTS, &c., of the United States, as set forth luminously in the Report in the recent Report of Hon. W. H. ELLSWORTH, Commissioner of Patents, will speedily be published at the office of the New York Tribune, in a neat and convenient book, of 96 octavo pages, with double columns. It is one of the most valuable and instructive Public Documents ever published, and should be in the hands of every man in the Union. The price will be 25 cents by the single copy, or $1 for five. Orders accompanied by the cash, will be attended to from postmasters, Newsmen, Booksellers, and others. Address Greeley & McElrath, Tribune Office, New York.

HEAR THE WORDS OF THE PREACHER.

HADDONFIELD, N. J., Feb. 12th, 1841.

Dr. D. Jayne—Sir: I take great pleasure of informing you that the bottle of Hair Tonic which I obtained of you last October, has proved most satisfactory and successful. My hair had for a long time been extremely thin. But two or three months past it had so fallen out that my head had become almost entirely bald. I was under the necessity of concealing the baldness, by combing the hair on the side over it. But now, although I use a bottle of the Tonic, I have no incumbrance in growth of hair as I ever had. C. C. PARK.

Late Pastor Baptist Church at Haddonfield, N. J.

Prepared only by Dr. D. Jayne, 20 South Third Street, Philadelphia, and 305 Broadway, New York.

THE WHOLE WORLD SHOULD KNOW IT, That Dr. Jayne's EXPECTORANT is a certain cure for Asthma, and that for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Whooping Cough, Croup, Bronchitis, and every other disease of the Lungs or Breast it is sure to produce the most decided benefit. It is recommended by thousands, who have tried it, and all say that it is the best remedy, without any exception, for all Pulmonary Diseases that has ever been known, for it always gives relief, and cures when every other means have failed.

Prepared only by Dr. D. JAYNE, No. 20 south Third street, Philadelphia, and No. 305 Broadway, New York. Price $1 per bottle.

TRAVELS IN THE WEST.—Oregon and the Rocky Mountains; a full, clear, graphic and authentic account of the Far West, by THOMAS J. FARNHAM, a recent Traveller to and Sojourner on the Banks of the Columbia River—will be published in a few days by GREELEY & McELRATH, in a Mammoth Extra Tribune of 96 large double column octavo pages, on new and beautiful type. Price 25 cents—5 copies for $1. Orders from Newsmen, Booksellers, Postmasters and others are respectfully solicited. All orders must be accompanied by the cash, and addressed to Greeley & McElrath, Tribune Office, New York.

The Markets.

Sales of Stocks.

By the Philadelphia Board of Brokers, for the week ending Thursday.

	Price sold for.
135 shares United States Bank,	3
107 do. Phil. Wil. & Balt. R. R.	9
50 do. Girard Bank,	1
66 do. Kentucky Bank,	47a50
27 do. Far. & Mechanics Bank,	25a25½
32 do. Man. & Mec. Bank,	11a11½
50 do. Northern Bank, Ex.	62½
$1000 Kentucky 6 per cent. Bonds,	94
$6300 U. States 6 per cent. Loan, 1862,	104
$500 Lehigh Mortgage Loan,	60
$2400 Cincin. Water Works, 6 per cent. Bonds,	81
$4000 Tenn. 5 per ct. Bonds,	64½
$28,000 Pennsylvania 5's, 1864,	90
9850 County 5's, 1870,	90
$600 Penna. 5's, 1858,	41
$1500 City 5's, 1866,	94½
$600 do. 1862,	94½
$1700 Lehigh 6's, 1843,	83
$3000 U. States 5½'s, 1844,	100
$470 Wilmington R. R., 6's, 1868,	62½
$2000 U. States 5½ per cents,	100

Philadelphia Market.

Remarks—Part of the first of remnie demanded for some time past in the Delaware river between this city and the Beaukwater, have come up, and are now discharging. The stocks being increased there has been no increased activity in the market, particularly for Sugar and Gems from the Poets.

THE TREASURES OF THE DEEP.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

What hid'st thou in thy treasure-caves and cells?
Thou hollow-sounding and capricious main!
Pale glistening pearls, and rainbow-colored shells,
Bright things that gleam unwarked of and in vain.
Keep, keep thy riches, unfathomably set!
We ask not such from thee.

Yet more, the depths have more!—what wealth untold,
Far down, and shining through their stillness, lies!
Thou hast the early gems, the burning gold,
Won from the thousand royal argosies.
Strong o'er the spoils, thou wild and wrathful main!
Earth claims not those again!

Yet more, the depths have more!—thy waves have rolled
Above the cities of a world gone by!
Sand hath filled up the palaces of old.
Sweeping o'ergrown the halls of revelry!
Dash o'er them, ocean! in thy mantled play,
Hide pride's dim tombs in decay!

Yet more, the billows and the depths have more!
High hearts and brave are gathered to thy bosom!
They hear not now the howling waters roar,—
The battle thunders will not break their rest.
Keep thy red gold and gems, thou stormy grave!
Give back the true and brave!

Give back the lost and lovely!—those for whom
The place was kept at board and hearth so long,—
The prayer went up through midnight's breathless gloom,
And the yearning voice 'midst festal song!
Hold fast thy buried isles, thy towers o'erflown,—
But oh! give back those who were your own!

To thee the love of woman hath given down;
Dark flow thy tides o'er manhood's noble heart,—
O'er youth's bright locks and beauty's flowery crown!
Yet must thou hear a voice,—Restore the dead!
Earth shall reclaim her precious things from thee!
Restore the dead, thou sea!

From the Monthlies.

FROM GRAHAM'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE, FOR MARCH.

PRACTITIONERS AND PATIENTS.

BY HELEN BERKLEY.

"Ah! Doctor, how d'ye do? Just the person I was thinking of!" said Dr. Quackenbos, as he drew up his comfortable cab-like gig in front of the Carlton House, and beside the Gothic-looking vehicle of a fashionable contemporary. "On your way to Percy's, Doctor?"

"Dr. Quackenbos—how are you, sir? I am on my way to Mr. Percy's—hem—let your groom drive on and take a seat beside me; you see I have room for four;" said Dr. Honeywood giving his reins to his liveried tiger.

Dr. Quackenbos had alighted with characteristic nimbleness, and accepted the offer almost before it was made. Dr. Honeywood condescendingly made room for him, submitted to the troublesome necessity of draping of his brown-colored gloves, and very slightly touched the Sarsons-like fingers of his companion.

"Intimate friend of Mr. Percy's ward, Doctor?" commenced Dr. Quackenbos.

"Miss Ruthven! Oh! yes—very interesting—hem. What was it you thought of her symptoms, Doctor?"

"The old story—nothing new in science now-a-days—it's all the same rehearsal of the part. Doctor, you know my theory that medicine, (as well as history,) ——"

"With all her volumes vast Has but one page."

My practice, Doctor, of late years, has been allow it is rather extensive—has taught me that almost all the ills 'flesh is heir to,' (celestiales exceptad,) may be summed up in the word imagination—different diseases are but the different varieties of imagination as different consonants. To cure them you must influence the imagination. Doctor, I call Miss Ruthven's case a confirmed case of imagination!" Dr. Quackenbos uttered these last words with energetic enthusiasm.

"Oh! yes—just so—just so"—interrupted Dr. Honeywood musingly; "as you say, imagination does a great deal—no disputing that. I've heard the same thing from many of the highest reputations in Europe. Besides, the lady was your patient before I was called in; you know her constitution. Her cough is rather severe though?"

"Spasmodic, Doctor, or occasioned by thinking about it; nothing more! Only remember the venerable lady, who had had the asthma for years, and when Sir Humphrey Davy cured in ten minutes by just touching a thermometer under her tongue! What do you call that but a case of sublimest imagination?"

"Exactly—Sir Humphrey was a great man—I knew a friend of his abroad."

"You have travelled all over Europe, Doctor, and ought to know best; but for my part, I have found bread and honey pills the most efficacious remedy for palpitations, coughs, headaches, nervousness, in fact every thing, as I said before, epidemic example."

"Right, Doctor—no disputing your opinion—bread and honey pills, good thing—very good things!"

"To be sure they are! And, Doctor, I am convinced that this practice of influencing the imagination has been resorted to by men of science since the world began. What was Perkinism but tickling the imagination with metallic tractors, and convincing people they were cured? What is animal magnetism but soothing the imagination by passes, and persuading people they are asleep, and you can work wonders on them? What is Homeopathy, pray, but fooling the imagination in a mysterious and incomprehensible manner? Doctor, I tell you the influence of mind upon matter is not appreciated nor understood—not appreciated." Dr. Quackenbos was obliged to pause to take breath.

"Just so—in comprehensible manner as you say—not appreciated—hem. By the way, the young lady is an heiress, is she not?"

She is an only child; her father died very rich, and she was left sole heiress. Her father's will brings her into possession of his estate on the day of her marriage, or on her twenty-first birthday. Her guardian, Mr. Percy, has a large family and is in very embarrassed circumstances. As he was a bosom friend of Ruthven's it's rather astonishing that he was left to legacy. However, he will be well enough off for Miss Ruthven was engaged, before her father's death, to Percy's oldest son."

"Ah! indeed—engaged, is he at present?"

"In Charleston, just commencing business for himself. I have heard, but it sounds rather improbable, and, indeed, I myself am inclined to doubt it, that young Mr. Percy prematurely proposed his union with the heiress until he was prosperously established in counsel."

"Rather improbable story, I should say—might have done a century ago—hem.—What was the extent of the property, in case Miss Ruthven died before she came of age, and unmarried?"

"In that case, the property goes to a distant branch of the family; a fashionable widow with three daughters. I believe you are acquainted with her—Mrs. Wurtlley?"

"Ah! Mrs. Wurtlley! Know her very well—fascinating woman—one of the elites. Do you don't think the young lady is in any danger?"

"Not the slightest! young girls are fanciful—like to think themselves ill. You must have seen thousands of such cases?"

"Ah! Mrs. Wurtlley! Know her very well—fascinating woman—one of the elites. Do you don't think the young lady is in any danger?"

"Not the slightest! young girls are fanciful—like to think themselves ill. You must have seen thousands of such cases?"

"Certainly, certainly—very common. I agree with you perfectly."

As Dr. Honeywood said these words, his vehicle stopped before a small two story house, in a rather unfashionable part of the city.

Dr. Quackenbos led the way to a miniature parlor, remarkable for its extreme neatness and the absence of every thing resembling luxury. An elderly lady sat beside the small stove, surrounded by a group of rosy-looking children, with their books and slates. There was something remarkably prepossessing in her appearance; and her smile, as she rose to receive them, would have been a passport to any heart embosomed in the impenetrable mail of conventionalism.

"How d'ye do? How are you, Mrs. Percy?" said Dr. Quackenbos in a genteel tone, and with some condescension of manner. "Dr. Honeywood and myself were out your way, so thought we would only a few moments to spare—patients waiting for me all over the city! How is the fair Marion to-day?"

"You shall see her immediately, Doctor," replied Mrs. Percy. "Lucy, my dear, tell Marion to come down stairs without delay."

"I sincerely hope, madam—hem—I hope, Mrs. Percy, that Miss Ruthven finds herself considerably relieved this morning—hem—I anticipate—hem—seeing her quite recovered?" said Dr. Honeywood.

"Ah! Doctor, we have many fears," began Mrs. Percy mournfully.

"Fears, madam! Have I not told you that we became your imagination was so active?" interrupted Dr. Quackenbos.

"But, Doctor, her cough is really fearful—the night sweats continue, and she has no appetite. Do you not think these alarming symptoms, sir?" And Mrs. Percy turned to the elder practitioner.

"My dear madam—hem—they are of very frequent occurrence—we meet with them every day—hem—no cause for alarm, my dear madam—hem what-ever."

"We trust every thing to you, sir; but indeed we are very much distressed. Would you think it advisable to call in further advice?" inquired Mrs. Percy, hardly knowing what she was saying, and only remembering that "in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom."

"Madam, madam!" said Dr. Quackenbos, hastily. "Beg pardon, ma'am—I say nothing of myself, for there are enough to speak of me, but what advice could you have superior to Dr. Honeywood's? Eminent man—great name on the continent. His time is so engrossed that he is obliged to be exclusive, and only visit his especial friends. My case is no similar instance, that friendship for you alone—"

"I acknowledge all that, Doctor; but Marion is really——"

The entrance of Miss Ruthven prevented further conversation on the subject. Surely there was little of the invalid in the bound of her elastic step—the cheek and lip bore not the pallid tint commonly the sphere of pulmonic ethics, caused to mediate her. Tall, but form and delicate to fragility, but there she had not yet attained the rounded security of maturity; her dark eyes glared with polished lustre; but here could it be otherwise when her spirit spread so constantly through them? The tint of her cheek was like the hue of the alternating sunbeam and shower, when it seems to think that the glory is departing, and yet cannot bear to leave the fresh of expression, or the rosy gift of youth and health!

"Right as a May morning, eh! Miss Marion?" began Dr. Quackenbos. "We shall hear next that Miss has prohibited your walking in his green-house, if you persist in carrying such cautious cons on your cheeks. How do you do today? Only a few minutes to spend with you—patients waiting drawn in every direction."

Marion had no time to reply before Dr. Honeywood addressed her.

"Looking well, my dear young lady—looking well—hem—how are you, my dear? hem—fat?" and Dr. Honeywood wiped his mouth, and then his eyes, and took Marion's small unmapped hand within his, and fastened his fingers and attention on her pulse, with all the gravity necessary for the performance of that difficult operation.

"I think I can tender this morning, Doctor," said Marion.

"Pulse weak—hem—tolerably weak—hem—quite weak;" continued Dr. Honeywood.

"That's from confinement to the house, Doctor, nothing else," said Dr. Quackenbos.

"Just so, just so; the weak constitutions, my dear young lady—great intellectuals, my dear—hem—be careful—hem—to your chest, my dear young lady!"

"I have a tolerable chest, sir," said Marion, interrupting her lest it should reach the ear of Mrs. Percy.

"Not a very good symptom; we must look to that, Doctor."

"Not important, Doctor; I have a pain in my chest myself very frequently, and a boulder sun does not ease through Broadway."

"True, Doctor, true; pains may exist without the slightest internal disease. How—you are improving rapidly, my dear young lady—improving. Oblige me with a sight of your tongue, my dear?" And Dr. Honeywood wiped his eyes once more with considerable deliberation, and then his mouth, and then his spectacles, in preparation for the all-important inspection.

"Fine—fine—fairest; rather furred, quite furred! What do you think, Doctor?"

"A little white; want air and exercise; nothing at all!"

"It's often much worse," timidly suggested Mrs. Percy.

"Just so, just so,—just so had as I think I've seen it, my dear," said the accommodating man of science, mentioned to adopt his views in the sight of all around him. "We'll soon remedy that, my dear young lady."

"We're delighted to find you so well, Miss Marion, and"—Dr. Quackenbos was interrupted by the entrance of a baby, somewhat past her prime, where studied and dawdling attire, and the faded charms it was intended to heighten, or restore, called forcibly to mind Goldsmith's expression of

"The glowing impudence of dress."

This lady threw her arms around Marion the instant she entered the room, and kissed her with the utmost tenderness. Mrs. Percy she saluted with more formality.

"It is a great gratification for me to find you here, gentlemen," said she, addressing the medical attendants. "I have been so worried about this dear girl! You must take the utmost care of her precious health. I presume you have brought her here to get her out (mood?" and the lady rose, by dint of much effort, to a tolerable pitch of shrillness.

"No danger at all, my dear Mrs. Wurtlley," said Dr. Quackenbos. "How charming you are looking! It's always a pleasure to meet you. Excessively sorry I am in such haste—upwards of a hundred calls to make this morning—have kept every body waiting, to see Miss Marion."

Mrs. Wurtlley, with a smile and a bow, turned from the gentlemen to Dr. Honeywood, whom she addressed in the same manner.

"I am very much concerned about dear Marion's health, Doctor. I am afraid her symptoms are very serious! Do tell me the truth!" And Mrs. Wurtlley's voice and lips expressed the utmost anxiety.

Dr. Honeywood assumed no small weight into character. "Quite serious, my dear madam—I assure you—hem—it's always best to keep these things quiet you know," was his reply.

"Alas, madam! I fear—I fear," said the lady sadly; every trace of alarm having mysteriously vanished from her face. "Now that I know the worst, my solicitude is quieted: she is so young too—twenty-eight months only—twenty-one! It is likely she will linger long, Doctor?"

Dr. Honeywood has not forgotten Miss Ruthven's fortune, and its next inheritor; and replied, "Not long, my dear madam—hem—not long, I fear. Your opinion is—hem—ha—I am fearful the young lady may overhear. I hope to meet you again, my madam."

"I shall never be sufficiently grateful to you, dear Doctor, for your attention to dear Marion, and the interest you take in her," said Mrs. Wurtlley, aloud. "We are all so grateful."

The doctor bowed, took up his hat, and drew on his gloves.

"Doctor," said Mrs. Percy timidly, "would not a Nuremberg plaster do Marion good?"

"Nuremberg plaster! Certainly—certainly—good thing!"

"Or a medicated plaster," suggested Mrs. Wurtlley.

"Certainly—hem—medicated plaster will do; both good—hem. Ladies, I wish you a very good morning. Doctor, are you ready?"

"Quite ready, Doctor. I have staid here too long, but I leave fair excuses behind me. Mrs. Percy—Mrs. Wurtlley—Miss Marion, good morning, as you is-morrow—good morning, Miss Marion—don't get your imagination excited, Miss Marion—good morning!"

A month passed on, and every day spread additional gloom over the quiet, well-regulated household of Mr. and Mrs. Percy. Marion was bedridden (and who could know her, and doubt she was beloved for herself?) alike by children and by parents. The very mention of her indisposition would moisten even the eyes of matrons. All "hoped against hope," for her strength was visibly failing. Her laugh was still the merriest, her eye the brightest, her cheek the rosiest, her spirit the most unclouded. But that lustrous eye had become unnatural, the rosy hued cheek hollow, and the gaiety of her spirit was like the flame of a torch, which burns brightest before it expires.

The visits of the two celebrated physicians continued daily. Dr. Quackenbos still talked of imagination, and assured Mrs. Percy that Miss Marion was well, or getting well. He still declared himself in a great hurry; but never a moment to spare—sick patients were calling on him in their agony on every side. Yet, once during the day, the invalid's room, (she especially devoted to Miss Ruthven's use, he generally had the good nature to bestow an hour or two of his invaluable attendance on the Percys; talking over the topics of the day, and explaining, upon his new theory concerning imagination. What fools could not Percy find with him? Certainly he did his duty, and sacrificed a large portion of his precious time out of pure friendship, as he declared to them. Of course his daily, but gratuitous, five dollars was an item of his disinterestedness a matter of consideration. If any evidence of his extensive practice was needed, it was found in the fact that almost every Sunday he was announced out of church in the midst of a prayer, or the instant the sermon commenced. His anxiety for his patients could be discerned, on such occasions, in the trepidation and haste with which he rose, and regretfully with which he resumed his seat in every pew.

As for Dr. Honeywood, she was called in at the earnest request of Mrs. Percy, shortly before our story commences, he was the most popular physician in New York. He possessed the invaluable faculty of pleasing every body; of seeing with every body's eyes; hearing with every body's ears; comprehending with every body's understanding; of giving consequence to every body's opinion by discovering that it was precisely his own.

It is related of La Fayette, that when he was receiving company at Castle Garden, New-York, two young gentlemen called upon him together. After expressing his happiness at seeing them, to the first he said, "You are a merchant, my young friend, sir." The gentleman answered in the affirmative. La Fayette cordially shook hands with him, exclaiming, "happy fellow! happy fellow!" To the second gentleman, he put the same question. His reply was, he replied in the negative, but for the first time, that it was a misfortune to be a bachelor. To his surprise, La Fayette no answer heard his answer, then he gave him a hearty slap on the shoulder, and cried out, "lucky dog! lucky dog!" This anecdote Dr. Honeywood heard in his youth, and he then made up his mind to adopt this one (or be termed it) great principle of action, of his illustrious predecessor. Perhaps he was slightly, very slightly, indebted to this determination for being considered the most amiable, sensible, pell-mell individual in the known world. After passing a few years of minority in Europe, he returned to New York, and blessed or cursed the Americans of the enviable reputation he had gained abroad. What better authority could they have had? Was it any wonder that he became the lion of physicians, or that he emulated King Midas in the manufacture of gold?

Marion's weakness increased so rapidly, that she herself soon became aware that it was attended with dangerous consequences. Her mother with Eustace Percy had been two years abroad, because she felt that the disinterestedness of his motives might be doubted, while his family were in straitened circumstances, and he himself not yet permanently established in business. He had contracted, shortly after Mr. Ruthven's death, for Charleston, and was now engaged in commerce in that city.

Marion wrote to her lover the instant her own fears were excited, and begged him to hasten to New York. From that time her decline was marked and fearfully rapid. Mr. Percy received her letter, and left Charleston the next day, with feelings which belie description. His family had seen the happiness of welcoming him amongst them, and he the grief of bidding his fair Marion drooping like a flower with the worm at its root.

For a few days previous to his arrival, Marion was compelled by debility to pass the greater portion of the day upon her couch. But now her sufferings had entirely ceased, and the hacking cough which annoyed her tender frame no longer pierced the ears and hearts of those around her. She was enchanting upon that day, in the anticipation of her lover's arrival, with her head resting fondly on his shoulder. His young sister and brothers, as usual thronged about her; some kneeling beside her, some holding his hand, others nothing but her companion, all anxious to prove their attention for the beloved one.

"Are you all here?" said Marion, looking round her affectionately.

"All—all—Lucy shall call her," replied Eustace.

Mrs. Percy was summoned. When she appeared, Marion raised herself with more strength than she had exhibited for weeks. Her eyes met the expression of indignant, which of late had clouded their blue lustre. The tenderness of her voice was gone; her brow resembled all their touching melody. Every heart grew lighter at these symptoms of returning health.

"Dear Eustace," said Marion, "I did not send for you merely for the happiness of beholding you once more; and I feel—I know that I have little time left for the enjoyment of my fondness. To you, my sisters, I have given them two years in which to prepare for what I cannot think you, Mother, can consider such, but not the heart's grandfather—not the paternal gentleman you have treated from me. A fatal cough—only a little longer! I shall need that cough."

Mrs. Percy turned away his head, and his wife could not repress her sobs.

Eustace replied with deep emotion, "Marion! do not talk thus, unless you would break our hearts! You will remain with us, to be our blessing—our benediction."

"In your prayers, if want I shall come—and your heaven I will indeed be, but shining from another head. Its light will hate you thither, Brother, where I shall await your coming. Do not stop me! it is of temporal things I would speak. The wealth my father left me would indeed be a poor return for the heart's riches you all lavished upon me. Yet, poor as it is, you must accept it when I shall have nothing else to offer—pray do not interrupt me! I am not yet of age, but by my mother with you, Eustace, I shall have power to bestow the perishable gift, which will be my last. We have little time to lose—to-morrow—to-morrow night, you will receive my hand. Father, mother, give me the right to call you so this last time ere you hear me! Eustace, my husband, we are united, if I dare upon you a bride less many than you could have wished!"

"Do not speak thus, Marion, if you would not drive me mad. You still recover—indeed you will. What motives would the world attribute, think you, to my parents and myself, if these hasty nuptials took place? Do not look thus, and cannot—I will be you will be restored to us, and then——"

"If my resolution fail me, Eustace, it will be accomplished through this medicine. Remove the silkcloth, which oppresses me, by supplicating in my desires, and it will assist my recovery more than any other medicine you can administer. It would be to me the happiest. Oh! are the wishes of the dying so lightly refused? To-morrow—not an hour beyond to-morrow evening."

He dared not endure the sinking girl either by a refusal or further discussion. Mrs. Percy instantly saw the danger of thwarting her wishes, and wrung her sons. He gave a forced assent to Marion's request, and she was persuaded to remain silent and quiet for the rest of the evening.

Marion looked better, and conversed more gaily the next day than she had done for weeks previous. She seemed buoyed up by hope; excluded from exertion. Once only, Eustace endeavored to remonstrate with her, but her agitation became so excessive, that he was forced to desist. She would not even listen to a short delay, but insisted that the ceremony should take place, in privacy, that very evening.

The day came away, and none but the relatives knew forget his scruples, in the indescribable happiness, which filled his heart, as the hour that was to make him a bridegroom approached. Evening found the hopeful family assembled in the drawing room, awaiting the clergyman. Eustace gazed with more than a lover's tenderness emotion upon his placid bride. He sighed as he beheld her cheek so fearless and pure as the white immortal robe that harmonized so well with her shadowy loveliness; but when he marked the holy calm, which illumined her spiritualized countenance, he could have bowed the knee before her as to a visitant from some higher sphere.

There was a quiet happiness diffused around the apartment, and entering the spirit of all. Every face reflected the serene joy mirrored on that of Marion. The clergyman entered the room. The preparations were concluded; the bride and bridegroom were summoned to stand forth, that their mutual vow might there be breathed on earth, and echoed in heaven.

Marion made an effort to rise, but sank back, faintness overpowered her.

"For heaven's sake, dear Marion, let this ceremony be delayed," said her mother.

"Not an hour—not a moment!—I am better—only—quite ready." And she rose with renewed strength. They stood together before the man of God. The ceremony commenced. As it proceeded, the form of Eustace encircled the waist of his bride, and gave her that support, which her limbs were fast refusing. His own vow was uttered, in spite of the agitation, clearly and distinctly. The minister turned to Marion, and the solemn question was put, "Wilt thou take Eustace for her wedded husband was put to her. A pause—a long, fearful pause ensued. No answer came. Every eye was now turned in terror on Marion. Her form was convulsed, her eyes vacantly upon the clergyman—her colorless lips apart, but no sound proceeded from betwixt them. Yet, she was not fainting—she did not even tremble—she seemed petrified, paralyzed. Again the question was repeated, "Wilt thou take Eustace?" Her lips moved as bring back her consciousness. A sudden effort spread a faint glow over her cheek. Her eyes closed gently and opened again—her lips quivered, and gave forth a sound (what could it proceed from so intense voice, so clear and hollow was its tone. They uttered but two words—"I will!" Her hand sank ribbon upon her bosom. The circling arm of Eustace sustained her increased weight. Powerful, regardless of everything, he caught her fearfully to his breast, rolled on her name; pressed her icy lips to his own! They chilled his very soul! These lips gave no return—that heart beat no response—those words were the last she ever spoke! Her eyes unclosed, but they had gone to behold her new registered in heaven. In the land of endless joy to await her reunion with her bridegroom!

* * * * * * *

"Most surprising case I ever met with in the whole course of my practice!" said Dr. Quackenbos, as he stood beside Marion's couch some two hours afterwards, surrounded by her weeping friends. "I only drove my carriage on the belief that no human vanity, may produce death, if not checked in the beginning. It is a disease that I shall henceforth regard as fatal. Is not this self evident, Doctor?"

"Just so—just so—" responded Dr. Honeywood, deferentially. "Just what I expected from the first! Pray do not weep, dear madam, I am grieved—dreadfully grieved myself—hem—I took a father's interest in the dear young lady. But there is no hope in such cases. I felt that it would end thus." And the Doctor wiped his eyes with unusual care, (as though searching out a tear,) but not until he had, as usual, performed the same office for his nostrils.

"Oh! is he not Doctor," said Marion's favorite little Lucy, "you said poor Marion would get well—you said so every day—oh! oh! oh! you did, Doctor?"

"My dear—hem—my dear young lady—hem—that was because we were doing all that humanity could do for her. Doctor, you know the exertions we made?"

"I do, indeed," returned Dr. Quackenbos. "And I still insist, Dr. Honeywood," added he, in a solemn and elevated tone, "as a medical man of the highest repute in this community, to say whether every possible means which skill could devise was not carried into execution to save her?"

"Just so, Doctor—I can testify to that. It was one of those cases, for which there is no cure."

"Yes, Doctor, the imagination! the imagination! I am now convinced, that it kills thousands. And since it is so potent, why should it not be! But I've a thousand calls to make this morning—patients waiting in every quarter. My dear Mrs. Percy, I condole with you sincerely. I am extremely grieved that I am obliged to leave you, but I do assure you, that every thing has been done; which must be a great consolation to you, as well as to ourselves. I am forced to be in unusual haste. Good morning."

Dr. Honeywood was called in, the same day to attend upon Mrs. Wurtlley, who was taken suddenly ill. Her indisposition was attributable, she said, entirely to the grief occasioned by dear Marion's death. Her conversation, however, turned principally upon the imprudence, not to say criminality, of the Percys, in permitting the young lady's marriage, while she was in so delicate a state; and her own belief, that as the ceremony was not entirely concluded the contract would not be considered valid. Dr. Honeywood agreed with her perfectly, which, unfortunately, was more than the Chancellor, some months afterwards, had the civility to do.

Dr. Quackenbos paid an unusual number of calls on the day of Marion's decease, and succeeded in persuading himself, and perhaps a few others, that the case was one of imagination. Alas! it would have been greater consolation, and worthier of his rhetorical powers, could he have convinced the breaking hearts, gathered round that beauteous corpse, that the death they mourned was an imaginary one!

The Humorist.

☞ A captain in the English navy, meeting a friend as he landed at Portsmouth, boasted that he had left the whole ship's crew the happiest fellows in the world. "Here is!" asked his friend. "Why, I have just flogged seventeen, and they are happy it is over, and the rest are happy that they have escaped."

☞ A sailor having attempted to kiss a lass he met with on shore, she bridled up and declared he had insulted her; whereupon Jack exclaimed, "Well, a tar. Mr. Ruthven's death, for Charleston, and was now engaged in commerce in that city.

Marion wrote to her lover the instant her own fears were excited, and begged him to hasten to New York. From that time her decline was marked and fearfully rapid. Mr. Percy received her letter, and left Charleston the next day, with feelings which belie description. His family had seen the happiness of welcoming him amongst them, and he the grief of bidding his fair Marion drooping like a flower with the worm at its root.

For a few days previous to his arrival, Marion was compelled by debility to pass the greater portion of the day upon her couch. But now her sufferings had entirely ceased, and the hacking cough which annoyed her tender frame no longer pierced the ears and hearts of those around her. She was enchanting upon that day, in the anticipation of her lover's arrival, with her head resting fondly on his shoulder. His young sister and brothers, as usual thronged about her; some kneeling beside her, some holding his hand, others nothing but her companion, all anxious to prove their attention for the beloved one.

"Are you all here?" said Marion, looking round her affectionately.

"All—all—Lucy shall call her," replied Eustace.

Mrs. Percy was summoned. When she appeared, Marion raised herself with more strength than she had exhibited for weeks. Her eyes met the expression of indignant, which of late had clouded their blue lustre. The tenderness of her voice was gone; her brow resembled all their touching melody. Every heart grew lighter at these symptoms of returning health.

"Dear Eustace," said Marion, "I did not send for you merely for the happiness of beholding you once more; and I feel—I know that I have little time left for the enjoyment of my fondness. To you, my sisters, I have given them two years in which to prepare for what I cannot think you, Mother, can consider such, but not the heart's grandfather—not the paternal gentleman you have treated from me. A fatal cough—only a little longer! I shall need that cough."

Mrs. Percy turned away his head, and his wife could not repress her sobs.

Eustace replied with deep emotion, "Marion! do not talk thus, unless you would break our hearts! You will remain with us, to be our blessing—our benediction."

"In your prayers, if want I shall come—and your heaven I will indeed be, but shining from another head. Its light will hate you thither, Brother, where I shall await your coming. Do not stop me! it is of temporal things I would speak. The wealth my father left me would indeed be a poor return for the heart's riches you all lavished upon me. Yet, poor as it is, you must accept it when I shall have nothing else to offer—pray do not interrupt me! I am not yet of age, but by my mother with you, Eustace, I shall have power to bestow the perishable gift, which will be my last. We have little time to lose—to-morrow—to-morrow night, you will receive my hand. Father, mother, give me the right to call you so this last time ere you hear me! Eustace, my husband, we are united, if I dare upon you a bride less many than you could have wished!"

"Do not speak thus, Marion, if you would not drive me mad. You still recover—indeed you will. What motives would the world attribute, think you, to my parents and myself, if these hasty nuptials took place? Do not look thus, and cannot—I will be you will be restored to us, and then——"

"If my resolution fail me, Eustace, it will be accomplished through this medicine. Remove the silkcloth, which oppresses me, by supplicating in my desires, and it will assist my recovery more than any other medicine you can administer. It would be to me the happiest. Oh! are the wishes of the dying so lightly refused? To-morrow—not an hour beyond to-morrow evening."

He dared not endure the sinking girl either by a refusal or further discussion. Mrs. Percy instantly saw the danger of thwarting her wishes, and wrung her sons. He gave a forced assent to Marion's request, and she was persuaded to remain silent and quiet for the rest of the evening.

Marion looked better, and conversed more gaily the next day than she had done for weeks previous. She seemed buoyed up by hope; unclouded from exertion. Once only, Eustace endeavored to remonstrate with her, but her agitation became so excessive, that he was forced to desist. She would not even listen to a short delay, but insisted that the ceremony should take place, in privacy, that very evening.

The day came away, and none but the relatives knew forget his scruples, in the indescribable happiness, which filled his heart, as the hour that was to make him a bridegroom approached. Evening found the hopeful family assembled in the drawing room, awaiting the clergyman. Eustace gazed with more than a lover's tenderness emotion upon his placid bride. He sighed as he beheld her cheek so fearless and pure as the white immortal robe that harmonized so well with her shadowy loveliness; but when he marked the holy calm, which illumined her spiritualized countenance, he could have bowed the knee before her as to a visitant from some higher sphere.

There was a quiet happiness diffused around the apartment, and entering the spirit of all. Every face reflected the serene joy mirrored on that of Marion. The clergyman entered the room. The preparations were concluded; the bride and bridegroom were summoned to stand forth, that their mutual vow might there be breathed on earth, and echoed in heaven.

Marion made an effort to rise, but sank back, faintness overpowered her.

"For heaven's sake, dear Marion, let this ceremony be delayed," said her mother.

"Not an hour—not a moment!—I am better—only—quite ready." And she rose with renewed strength. They stood together before the man of God. The ceremony commenced. As it proceeded, the form of Eustace encircled the waist of his bride, and gave her that support, which her limbs were fast refusing. His own vow was uttered, in spite of the agitation, clearly and distinctly. The minister turned to Marion, and the solemn question was put, "Wilt thou take Eustace for her wedded husband was put to her. A pause—a long, fearful pause ensued. No answer came. Every eye was now turned in terror on Marion. Her form was convulsed, her eyes vacantly upon the clergyman—her colorless lips apart, but no sound proceeded from betwixt them. Yet, she was not fainting—she did not even tremble—she seemed petrified, paralyzed. Again the question was repeated, "Wilt thou take Eustace?" Her lips moved as bring back her consciousness. A sudden effort spread a faint glow over her cheek. Her eyes closed gently and opened again—her lips quivered, and gave forth a sound (what could it proceed from so intense voice, so clear and hollow was its tone. They uttered but two words—"I will!" Her hand sank ribbon upon her bosom. The circling arm of Eustace sustained her increased weight. Powerful, regardless of everything, he caught her fearfully to his breast, rolled on her name; pressed her icy lips to his own! They chilled his very soul! These lips gave no return—that heart beat no response—those words were the last she ever spoke! Her eyes unclosed, but they had gone to behold her new registered in heaven. In the land of endless joy to await her reunion with her bridegroom!

* * * * * * *

"Most surprising case I ever met with in the whole course of my practice!" said Dr. Quackenbos, as he stood beside Marion's couch some two hours afterwards, surrounded by her weeping friends. "I only drove my carriage on the belief that no human vanity, may produce death, if not checked in the beginning. It is a disease that I shall henceforth regard as fatal. Is not this self evident, Doctor?"

"Just so—just so—" responded Dr. Honeywood, deferentially. "Just what I expected from the first! Pray do not weep, dear madam, I am grieved—dreadfully grieved myself—hem—I took a father's interest in the dear young lady. But there is no hope in such cases. I felt that it would end thus." And the Doctor wiped his eyes with unusual care, (as though searching out a tear,) but not until he had, as usual, performed the same office for his nostrils.

"Oh! is he not Doctor," said Marion's favorite little Lucy, "you said poor Marion would get well—you said so every day—oh! oh! oh! you did, Doctor?"

"My dear—hem—my dear young lady—hem—that was because we were doing all that humanity could do for her. Doctor, you know the exertions we made?"

"I do, indeed," returned Dr. Quackenbos. "And I still insist, Dr. Honeywood," added he, in a solemn and elevated tone, "as a medical man of the highest repute in this community, to say whether every possible means which skill could devise was not carried into execution to save her?"

"Just so, Doctor—I can testify to that. It was one of those cases, for which there is no cure."

"Yes, Doctor, the imagination! the imagination! I am now convinced, that it kills thousands. And since it is so potent, why should it not be! But I've a thousand calls to make this morning—patients waiting in every quarter. My dear Mrs. Percy, I condole with you sincerely. I am extremely grieved that I am obliged to leave you, but I do assure you, that every thing has been done; which must be a great consolation to you, as well as to ourselves. I am forced to be in unusual haste. Good morning."

Dr. Honeywood was called in, the same day to attend upon Mrs. Wurtlley, who was taken suddenly ill. Her indisposition was attributable, she said, entirely to the grief occasioned by dear Marion's death. Her conversation, however, turned principally upon the imprudence, not to say criminality, of the Percys, in permitting the young lady's marriage, while she was in so delicate a state; and her own belief, that as the ceremony was not entirely concluded the contract would not be considered valid. Dr. Honeywood agreed with her perfectly, which, unfortunately, was more than the Chancellor, some months afterwards, had the civility to do.

Dr. Quackenbos paid an unusual number of calls on the day of Marion's decease, and succeeded in persuading himself, and perhaps a few others, that the case was one of imagination. Alas! it would have been greater consolation, and worthier of his rhetorical powers, could he have convinced the breaking hearts, gathered round that beauteous corpse, that the death they mourned was an imaginary one!

The Humorist.

☞ A captain in the English navy, meeting a friend as he landed at Portsmouth, boasted that he had left the whole ship's crew the happiest fellows in the world. "Here is!" asked his friend. "Why, I have just flogged seventeen, and they are happy it is over, and the rest are happy that they have escaped."

☞ A sailor having attempted to kiss a lass he met with on shore, she bridled up and declared he had insulted her; whereupon Jack exclaimed, "Well, a tar. Mr. Ruthven's death, for Charleston, and was now engaged in commerce in that city.

Marion wrote to her lover the instant her own fears were excited, and begged him to hasten to New York. From that time her decline was marked and fearfully rapid. Mr. Percy received her letter, and left Charleston the next day, with feelings which belie description. His family had seen the happiness of welcoming him amongst them, and he the grief of bidding his fair Marion drooping like a flower with the worm at its root.

For a few days previous to his arrival, Marion was compelled by debility to pass the greater portion of the day upon her couch. But now her sufferings had entirely ceased, and the hacking cough which annoyed her tender frame no longer pierced the ears and hearts of those around her. She was enchanting upon that day, in the anticipation of her lover's arrival, with her head resting fondly on his shoulder. His young sister and brothers, as usual thronged about her; some kneeling beside her, some holding his hand, others nothing but her companion, all anxious to prove their attention for the beloved one.

"Are you all here?" said Marion, looking round her affectionately.

"All—all—Lucy shall call her," replied Eustace.

Mrs. Percy was summoned. When she appeared, Marion raised herself with more strength than she had exhibited for weeks. Her eyes met the expression of indignant, which of late had clouded their blue lustre. The tenderness of her voice was gone; her brow resembled all their touching melody. Every heart grew lighter at these symptoms of returning health.

"Dear Eustace," said Marion, "I did not send for you merely for the happiness of beholding you once more; and I feel—I know that I have little time left for the enjoyment of my fondness. To you, my sisters, I have given them two years in which to prepare for what I cannot think you, Mother, can consider such, but not the heart's grandfather—not the paternal gentleman you have treated from me. A fatal cough—only a little longer! I shall need that cough."

Mrs. Percy turned away his head, and his wife could not repress her sobs.

Eustace replied with deep emotion, "Marion! do not talk thus, unless you would break our hearts! You will remain with us, to be our blessing—our benediction."

"In your prayers, if want I shall come—and your heaven I will indeed be, but shining from another head. Its light will hate you thither, Brother, where I shall await your coming. Do not stop me! it is of temporal things I would speak. The wealth my father left me would indeed be a poor return for the heart's riches you all lavished upon me. Yet, poor as it is, you must accept it when I shall have nothing else to offer—pray do not interrupt me! I am not yet of age, but by my mother with you, Eustace, I shall have power to bestow the perishable gift, which will be my last. We have little time to lose—to-morrow—to-morrow night, you will receive my hand. Father, mother, give me the right to call you so this last time ere you hear me! Eustace, my husband, we are united, if I dare upon you a bride less many than you could have wished!"

"Do not speak thus, Marion, if you would not drive me mad. You still recover—indeed you will. What motives would the world attribute, think you, to my parents and myself, if these hasty nuptials took place? Do not look thus, and cannot—I will be you will be restored to us, and then——"

"If my resolution fail me, Eustace, it will be accomplished through this medicine. Remove the silkcloth, which oppresses me, by supplicating in my desires, and it will assist my recovery more than any other medicine you can administer. It would be to me the happiest. Oh! are the wishes of the dying so lightly refused? To-morrow—not an hour beyond to-morrow evening."

He dared not endure the sinking girl either by a refusal or further discussion. Mrs. Percy instantly saw the danger of thwarting her wishes, and wrung her sons. He gave a forced assent to Marion's request, and she was persuaded to remain silent and quiet for the rest of the evening.

Marion looked better, and conversed more gaily the next day than she had done for weeks previous. She seemed buoyed up by hope; unclouded from exertion. Once only, Eustace endeavored to remonstrate with her, but her agitation became so excessive, that he was forced to desist. She would not even listen to a short delay, but insisted that the ceremony should take place, in privacy, that very evening.

The day came away, and none but the relatives knew forget his scruples, in the indescribable happiness, which filled his heart, as the hour that was to make him a bridegroom approached. Evening found the hopeful family assembled in the drawing room, awaiting the clergyman. Eustace gazed with more than a lover's tenderness emotion upon his placid bride. He sighed as he beheld her cheek so fearless and p